MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—"The restless analyst," to use Mr. Henry James's own most appropriate description of himself, is at work with a vengeance in "The American Scene" (1), and the analysis is exquisite at once in its minuteness and in its expression. The very subtlety, however, of its minuteness and of its expression baffles continually the reader who lacks the time or the intelligence, or both together—as in my humble case—to master it. "Style," says Schopenhauer, "is the physiognomy of the mind, and a safer index to character than the face," and Mr. James's style is the man himself—superlatively subtle, analytic, microscopic at once in its introspection and in its observation. His attempt, therefore, to convey to you an adequate impression of his impressions of such a stentorian, so to say, city as New York, is like the attempt of a man with an ear so fine as to be able to hear the grass grow, to describe the effect upon him of the blasts of a steam-organ. He takes his revenge upon it by a sort of antiphrasis—by expressing his horror of it in a style as subtle as his subject is brutal; and it is this style which continually baffled and sometimes bewildered me. I do not carry my modesty so far as to say that I failed to understand the following typical sentence; but I have to confess

(1) "The American Scene." By Henry James. (London: Chapman & Hall. 12s. 6d. net.)

(2) "Life of Lord Chesterfield." An Account of the Ancestry, Personal Character, and Public Services of the Fourth Earl of Chesterfield. By W. H. Craig. With Twenty-eight Full-page Illustrations. (London: John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

(3) "Her Son." A Chronicle of Love. By Horace Annesley Vachell. (London: John Murray. 6s.)

(4) "The Flying Cloud." By Morley Roberts. (London: Hurst & Blackett, Ltd. 6s.)

that it took me more time to understand it than I could well spare to it, or even, perhaps, than it deserved to have devoted to its translation:—

"This sense of dispossession (by the alien), to be brief about it, haunted me so, I was to feel in the New York streets and in the packed trajectiles to which one clingingly appeals from the streets, just as one tumbles back into the streets in appalled reaction from them that the art of beguiling or duping it became an art to be cultivated—though the fond alternative vision was never long to be obscured, the imagination exasperated to envy, of the ideal, in the order in question; of the luxury of some such close and sweet and whole national consciousness as that of the Switzer and the Scot."

That is an average sentence which an ordinary intelligence like mine can take in even at first reading, if it be read as a schoolboy slowly renders Greek; but there are other passages which even a second careful reading did not make distinctly clear to me. The result is a double irritation; irritation at my own stupidity, and irritation with the writer who brought it home to me, perhaps unnecessarily. Perhaps unnecessarily, I say, because I imagine that Mr. James could have expressed his meaning, however subtle or elusive, more intelligibly if he had chosen to dispense with his inversions, parentheses, and the habit, to use his own frequent simile, of starting hare after hare, pursuing each for a little but pursuing none to the death. Mr. James's general impression of America seems to be that it is a fine country—to live out of, for the man, at least, who lacks the American greed of money and faculty for money-making. This was specially brought home to him by the articles in the shops and by the manners of the shopkeepers. The "protected" articles are so dear and poor, and the take-it-or-leave-it manners of the shopman are so repellent—even in Boston—that "the customer asks himself if he can really bear the combination of such general manners and such general prices, of such general prices and such general manners. He has a helpless bewildered moment during which he wonders if he mightn't bear the prices a little better if he were a little better addressed, or bear the usual form of address a little better if the prices were in themselves—given the commodity offered—a little less humiliating to the purchaser." But the commodity offered in every shop bore the impress of "an economic law of which one had not for years known the unholy rigour, the vision of 'protected' production and of commodities requiring certainly in many cases every advantage Protection could give them." These two considerations alone—American bad manners and American dear and bad protected goods—helped to explain to Mr. James the immense number of absentee Americans. Only those who can make enough money to compensate them for the uncomfortable conditions of American life, can endure to live there. "To make so much money that you won't, that you don't 'mind'—don't mind anything—that is absolutely, I think, the main American formula. Thus your making no money—or so little that it passes there for none—and being thereby distinctly reduced to minding, amounts to your being reduced to the knowledge that America is no place for you." It is a place, in fact, only "for the upper sort who can build their own castles and move by their own motors," and for the lower sort who can make money enough to enable them to enjoy their ideal of felicity and prosperity, which is "to rush about in promiscuous packs and hustled herds." I suppose no one with an acuter sense of all that is brassy, blatant, tawdry, and sordid ever visited, or rather revisited, America than Mr. James, and certainly no visitor has ever expressed his impressions in a style so exquisitely super-subtle as to be the very antithesis of the crudeness it records.

"Do you hear?" cries Hamlet to Polonius, "let the players be well used; for they are the abstract and brief chronicles of the time; after your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you live." Certainly what in a later than Shakespeare's day corresponded to the player—the popular journalist or author—can make or mar a reputation through partiality or prejudice. Here, e.g., is Mr. Craig's excellent "Life of Lord Chesterfield" (2) trying to overtake and confute the universal impression of that statesman derived from Johnson's famous letter on patronage, and from his still more famous epigram on his lordship's letters to his son as "teaching the morals of a prostitute and the manners of a dancing master." Mr. Craig leaves you in no doubt that Lord Chesterfield was one of the most capable and sagacious statesmen of his age. His prediction of the French Revolution alone vindicates his sagacity:—"All the symptoms which I have ever met with in history previous to great changes and revolutions in government now exist and daily increase in France." His capacity as a statesman was put to a crucial test in Ireland, where he governed admirably—from an English and Protestant standpoint—and impartially even from that of an Irish Catholic. To him, too, we owe our belated acceptance of the reformed Calendar, the Bill for which he piloted through the House of Lords with a tact that was as statesmanlike as his ability. Then, in the days of Walpole, when almost every conscience was supple and every politician saleable, neither money nor place could purchase Lord Chesterfield. Even the famous, or infamous, "Letters to his Son," which were never intended for publication, give other and better—incomparably better—advice than Johnson's vindictive epigram would suggest. Mr. Craig's Life is as interesting as it is admirable.

I have not seen the stage version of Mr. Vachell's "Her Son" (3), but I hope its heroine is more probable than she appears to me to be in the novel. It is incredible that she should make the compact exacted from her by her lover's mistress—to have no communication with him for a year—it is even more incredible that she should adopt his and this woman's abandoned child as her own; and most incredible of all that she should masquerade as a widow, to the scandal and estrangement of all her friends. Whether Dorothy Fairfax appears more probable on the stage I cannot say; but I can well understand from the ingenious plot of the novel that the story in its dramatic form may abound in interesting, striking, and even melodramatic situations. Mr. Morley Roberts' "The Flying Cloud" (4) is an excellent story of a sea voyage under the unusual conditions of an opium-eating captain in command! There is no love interest, nor, indeed, interest of any other kind than that you feel in the fortunes of a ship's crew and passengers under such singular circumstances. I ought to say, though, that the opium scenes and the effects of the drug on the captain are vividly described, and, that the whole voyage reads like a faithful record of its mate's, Mackintosh's, real experiences.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

Richard Cobden was a municipal reformer as well as a fiscal reformer. Before he became imperishably identified with the Free Trade movement, he had played the foremost part in ridding Manchester of the shackles of the preposterously antiquated and grotesquely inefficient system of local government through a manorial court—a survival from feudal times—in which that great town was actually held till the year 1838. A tract from Cobden's pen, called "Incorporate Your Borough," had a powerful influence in the struggle, which ended in the granting of a municipal charter to Manchester. For more than half a century no copy of this tract could be traced, but Mrs. Cobden Unwin at last discovered one among some family papers, and it is now reproduced in facsimile in a book entitled "Cobden as a Citizen," which Mr. T. Fisher Unwin has just published. Mr. William E. A. Axon has written, by way of introduction, an account of Cobden's career and services as a municipal reformer; and as an appendix a complete Cobden bibliography is given. The volume is bound in vellum and printed on hand-made paper, and is embellished with several photogravure plates and other illustrations. It is issued in a special limited edition, price 21s. per copy.

Mark Twain's humour shows itself time after time in his book on "Christian Science" (Harper and Brothers, price 6s.), but in the main he devotes himself to a serious criticism of that remarkable creed. On the sordid commercial aspect of the Eddy imposture he is particularly severe. The Dollar is the single material thing in the world whose reality is admitted by Christian Science. "The Dollar is hunted down in all sorts of ways; the Christian Science Mother Church and Bargain-counter in Boston peddles all kinds of spiritual wares to the faithful, and always on the one condition—cash, cash in advance." Mark Twain is unfortunately driven to the conclusion that the Christian Science organisation is likely to become increasingly strong in America; and, judging from all that one hears, its dupes in London are becoming more numerous, in spite of the exposures that have taken place. It is a mad world.

The "Personal Opinions Publicly Expressed' by "Rita" in the volume bearing that title (Eveleigh Nash, price 6s.) are usually very strong opinions expressed with a good deal of force—in some cases, too, with a good deal of bitterness. All sorts and conditions of men and women—especially women—come under the lash of "Rita's" criticism. About editors and reviewers she makes some particularly unkind remarks. Whether one praised her book or condemned it, one's motive would probably be misunderstood, and perhaps, therefore, the best thing will be to say nothing more about it.

The two volumes of "Dramatic Opinions and Essays by Bernard Shaw," just published by Messrs. Constable and Co., price 10s. 6d. net, are composed of a selection from the criticisms which Mr. Shaw contributed to the Saturday Review ten years or so ago. In his "author's apology" he explains that if the decision had rested with him, these articles would have been allowed to sleep in the files of the journal in which they first appeared. Other people, however, intended to reprint them in America, and, being powerless to prevent this, Mr. Shaw has been forced—"not, of course, very unwillingly"—to make the best of the situation by inviting his own publishers to anticipate the pirates.

Mr. Frederic Harrison's new volume, "The Creed of a Layman: Apologia Pro Fide Mea," is a "plain tale" of his religious and philosophical development. It contains, the author says, nothing in any way sensational, spasmodic, or original, but as a story of how spiritual rest might be achieved it may "prove useful to some perturbed spirit in our troubled times." The book is being published by Messrs. Macmillan.

Two more volumes (price 4s. net) of the new copyright edition of "The Collected Works of Henrik Ibsen," revised and edited by Mr. William Archer, have been published by Mr. Heinemann. Volume IV. contains "Peter Gynt," and volume VIII. "An Enemy of the People" and "The Wild Duck." Mr. Archer furnishes a biographical and critical introduction to each play.

That good sportsman, Colonel R. F. Meysey-Thompson, has followed up his "Fishing Catechism" and "Shooting Catechism" by another little volume entitled "A Hunting Catechism" (Edward Arnold, price 3s. 6d. net), which ought to prove equally popular. The author explains that, like its predecessors, it was suggested by the instructions given to his own children from his own past experience, which extends over a period of forty years.

Mr. Anthony Hope's "Tristram of Blent," and Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch's "Fort Amity," have been re-issued by Mr. Murray in popular half-crown editions. Messrs. Longmans, Green, and Co. have published at the same price a new edition of Eyre Hussey's "Miss Badsworth, M.F.H.," the best novel of hunting life that has appeared in recent years.

A couple of volumes have recently been added to Messrs. Newnes's popular "Art Library" (3s. 6d. net per volume), one containing a second series of forty-nine reproductions of paintings by Sir Edward Burne-Jones, and the other "The Landscapes of George Frederick Watts"—eighteen plates, with a portrait of the artist. Each volume has a descriptive and critical introduction, M. Arsine Alexandre writing on the works of Burne-Jones, and Mr. Walter Bayes on Watts's landscapes.

Mr. C. M. Knowles, of the Middle Temple, is the author of a volume on "The Law Relating to Compensation for Injuries to Workmen," published by Stevens and Sons, price 6s. His lucid exposition of the Act of 1906 should be useful not only to lawyers, but to employers and every one else who may have to deal with claims to compensation.

I have received the 1907 volume of "The Foreign Office List and Diplomatic and Consular Year-Book," edited by Mr. Godfrey E. P. Hertslet, of the Foreign Office, and published by Messrs. Harrison and Sons, price 10s. 6d. In common with other editors, Mr. Hertslet finds that a policy of cutting down must be adopted if this official publication is to be kept within reasonable limits. One of its features is a statement of the services of persons now serving, or who have served, under the Foreign Office at home or abroad. It includes references to a great many subordinate or temporary officials whose connection with the Department ceased years ago, and whose names would be ruthlessly expunged by any editor with a free hand. But an official editor has to walk warily in these matters, and so in the present volume Mr. Hertslet gives formal notice to a list of two or three dozen ex-officials—vice-consuls, consular constables, legation messengers, and so forth—that their names will be removed from future editions unless in the meantime information is received to warrant their retention.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—London seems frightfully noisy. In addition to all our other enemies in this way, we have now the painters, masons, and bricklayers at work to an enormous extent. Almost everybody seems to be having their house done up or added to. A rage for building and rebuilding has seized upon the land. Nobody seems to take a house as it stands nowadays. There must be alterations. A very favourite one consists in taking away the wall of the passage on which the hall door opens, and in this way throwing the ground floor room into the hall. This is sometimes an improvement, but not always. In a climate like ours a draught is an enemy to be avoided. One never knows of what atrocity it may be capable—what form of annoyance it may inflict. Therefore, why destroy one's only defence from the cold wind that is only too delighted to rush into a warm house the very moment the front door is opened? In summer, or in Spain, or in the South Sea Islands, nothing could be better. We were dining with the Smith-Joneses the other evening, and they have had the wall taken away from their nice, wide hall, and a kind of glass case constructed round the hall door itself. It is all very quaint and pretty, and the glass case was in beautiful colours, made radiant by pale pink-globed electric lights; but when the postman knocked, everybody jumped, so near did it sound, and an express messenger's rat-tat, rat-tat, was responsible for a heavy breach in the conversation.

The Abercies cut away last year their drawing-room wall at the head of the staircase. The summer was very hot, and the constant aëration of the large room was very pleasant. But when that very cold weather came in in December, they were put to it to find hangings thick enough to keep away the breezes that blew upstairs from the ground floor and down stairs from open bedroom windows. Screens, too, were commandeered, and at last the open space at the head of the stairs began to look like a barricade in a French revolution. The last time we dined there some one asked Mr. Abercy if the house was his own. "No," he said, "and we have not even a long lease of it. Couldn't get one." "Shall you be obliged to replace this wall?" was the next question. "I suppose so," was the rather chilly reply. No man likes to be convicted of rash outlay.

We all, by the way, listened for the answers, though we wholly disapproved of the questions. They are such bad manners. We did not object, however, to have our curiosity gratified when it was some one else who was guilty of a social fault. Perhaps some of us even, in our thoughts, took very high rank indeed by quoting inwardly the saying that "fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

So I forgot to give you the address of Humphreys, where I saw all those lovely frocks. It is 14, Onslow-place, just opposite South Kensington station.

Mim is back in town again. She raves about the beauty of Donegal and the delightful hotel she has been staying at, the Drumaweir, on the shores of Lough Foyle, at Greencastle. It is literally on the very shore, only a smooth, turfy lawn between, so that velvet sea-breezes enter at every window. The quiet of the place enchanted her. There are good golf links, which pleased Henry very much, and so did the excellent cooking and the moderate terms. Mim has made us long to go. She describes the drives as the loveliest she has ever had, with their mingling of seascape, mountain, and green valleys, with beautiful skies and marvellous sunsets. And the ladies who keep the hotel are so nice. "Just like amiable private hostesses," says Mim.

Jim gave me a birthday treat last week—a dinner in the East Room at the Criterion and a play after. There were four of us, the ideal number for a dinner, and we were very gay. Jim fairly sparkled with Irish wit, and he has that agreeable gift of bringing out all that is brightest in others. The old line tells about "a feast of reason and a flow of soul," but who ever expects anything so high-falutin' in these degenerate days? We had a feast of humour and a flow of fun, and surely that is as high as any one can expect to get. It was good enough for us, any way, and everything was nice—the pretty room, the low music, the delicious food, and the Widow, iced to a turn and most excellently dry.

Jim told us that one afternoon last week he took a girl to tea at the Criterion and could not get in! Their teas have caught on wonderfully, and it is now "the thing" to have your cup that cheers at the Cri. So every one seems to think; so the great rooms are filled to overflowing with a well-dressed crowd. I like looking at people and guessing all about them, don't you? Wondering why the girl with the yellow hair wears red; whether that absorbed young couple are only engaged or newly married; whether the large man who groans when he moves can possibly be the husband of that pretty girl, scarcely more than a child; and whether that furtively whispering couple is planning an elopement. Human nature is the most interesting study that there is.

Jim took us on to the Duke of York's, where we enjoyed seeing Miss Irene Vanbrugh take snuff, and hearing her wild sneezes just when she so earnestly wants to say something, in "The Great Conspiracy." The Empire gowns were most becoming. I suppose our eyes have become trained to them in some degree by the number of modified Empire modes to which we have lately become inured.

I hope you admire the latest of what Bert calls his "capital ideas" in practical jokes. On Edith's wedding morning he was inspired to scatter a few nails in the avenue just before she and her father were to start in the motor for the church two miles away. You can guess the consequences—Bride half an hour late for church; bridegroom purple with agitation, not knowing the cause; bride's father equally purple, if not purpler; Bert going off in smothered explosions of guffaws all through the service; every one else hating him heartily. Now what real pleasure could he have got out of this performance? It is a fact that he did get pleasure out of it. It lasted him all day, and when we left he was still enjoying himself, though every one showed the most intense dislike of and contempt for him.

Do you remember the day he slipped a bit of soap into the mayonnaise that cook had left for a moment on the scullery table? That piece of fun lasted him for a week. How curiously constructed he must be! He does not in the least mind the hatred and indignation he excites, and as for the inconvenience and annoyance he causes to others he simply enjoys them. When any one remonstrates he merely says: "Oh, well, a practical joke, you know—and some of mine are rather clever." Bert really ought to be suppressed. I am sure that even his mother must dislike him at times, perhaps always.

We were favoured with an invitation to Mrs. James Stuart's reception of the Colonial Premiers on Friday evening in the Whitehall Rooms, and were delighted with the opportunity of seeing our very interesting visitors at close quarters. The whole affair was well organised, and though over 2,000 guests poured into the beautiful cream and gold room, there was not the smallest confusion, and no overcrowding. One reason of this was that a succession of interesting performances was given in the Entertainment Room, so that many drifted off there. We, however, found our best entertainment in standing near the door, listening to the names as they were announced, and studying their owners. We knew Sir Wilfrid Laurier by his grand forehead, before his name was pronounced. He looks very kind and gentle as well as supremely clever. Lord Strathcona's shaggy white eyebrows add to the keen outlook of his piercing eyes. They have a kind of watchful expression that is not often seen in cities. More than half the House of Commons was present. The Premier wore his usual air of bonhomie, as one who has no cares. And yet he must surely feel the burden of the State press heavily at times. General Botha has a strong face, lit up with a smile that is almost merry. We had all pictured him so differently. His daughter looked as fresh as possible. She is a handsome girl, looks simple and unspoilt. Her aunt, Miss Botha, has a very fine face, with much character in it.

Some of the Colonial ladies were superb of stature. Several were beautiful, in a stately way; others had apparently never heard of the grand manner, and rolled into the room anyhow. We loved them for it. Some of the girls were all a-gaze, much more concerned with the impression things were making on them than with the impression they themselves were making on others. That is always so engaging. So many of us, nowadays, are self-conscious.

How we wished that everybody had been labelled. As we moved through the rooms after the thickest of the human stream had poured through the door, and noticed stars and orders and ribbons, we should have liked to have handed a copy of "Who's Who" to several of those present and begged them to find themselves in it and hand it back to us. Wouldn't it have been rude—and very pleasant? Canada, as you know, is our pet colony. We know such delightful Canadians, and to know them is to love them. Therefore, we should have liked to be able to single out all present who were from Canada and to shake hands with them. This would have been surprising conduct. The rooms were all beautifully decorated with flowers, and the reception was a brilliant success. I noticed the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland and his brother-in-law, Lord Tweedmouth, in the crowd, and Lord and Lady Haddo were of the family party. Mrs. Herbert Gladstone was a graceful figure. She was with her husband. There were several judges present, some bishops, many Royal Academicians, so you can imagine that the atmosphere was one of mingled law and learning, politics and pleasure, art and statesmancraft. Had we had time to think of ourselves, we must have felt small amidst so much that was great, or, at least, important, but we were much too interested to waste a thought on our own insignificance.

We admired our host and hostess (the latter in a lovely white satin and lace) for their endurance in shaking hands 2,000 times. They really seemed to like it, and our Colonial friends can shake hands heartily.

We are feeling rather superior—a very comfortable but unfortunately rather rare attitude of mind for us—because we got our spring cleaning over before any one else. I am surprised that you, so excellent a manager, are so late as this, but no doubt there is some good reason for it. Send for Liberty's book on "Furnishing Fabrics," a perfect boon to the country housewife possessing artistic taste. In it there are exact reproductions in colour of their chintzes, cretonnes, linens, tapestries, brocades, and curtains, so that you know exactly the tints of what you are ordering without the fag of sending for patterns and spending an hour of indecision over them. Do not forget, either, that you can have wood panelling from them at an extremely low price, should you want to give one of your rooms an old-world charm. You should see Enid's lovely flat, with its outlook on the Thames. It is all wood-panelled to a considerable height, then filled in with a creamy moulding, which she has had shaded in a most æsthetic manner. But, then, dear Enid possesses absolutely perfect taste.

We stayed last week at the Riverbank Club at Amerden Bank, Taplow, and mean to do so often again. It is really ideal. It is quite near Bray Lock, and the soft murmur of the weir is pleasant to hear as one sits on the lawn. The house is a quaint and picturesque one, and as both men and women may be members there is abundance of companionship, both masculine and feminine. We know two men who go and stay there when they want to work, one at writing books, the other at painting pictures. The quiet is beyond everything delightful. The house is heated throughout with warm air, the cooking is good, and the terms are very moderate. It is so nice to have this quiet retreat within half-an-hour of town. Boats and carriages are provided by the management, so that each member gets his or her full two-guineas' worth. Seems cheap, does it not?

A pleasant proof of the success of the recent sale of the Irish Industries Association at the Ritz Hotel is afforded by the announcement that the sum taken in the two afternoons was no less than £1,897. The total amount the Association has realised by its sales for the benefit of the poor cottage workers in Ireland is now brought up to £143,000—a record of which all concerned have good reason to be proud. In particular, congratulations are due to Mr. J. S. Wood, the honorary organiser, for this sum, added to other funds which he has started or worked, completes a grand total of a quarter of a million which he has been largely instrumental in raising for various charities.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:

DEAREST MADGE,—Poets are born, not made; one wonders if many baby poets are now, in these early years of the century, resting in their cradles or playing in their nurseries. If there are many such, how lucky for the poet babes that they only are babes just now, for surely no era was ever more unpoetic or less idealistic. Ours is essentially a world of prose and realism; in the rush of the motor and the crush of the crowd, who cares for the muses? A hurrying world turns from them with absolute indifference; there is not money in them, and what else matters? These ladies with their antiquated ways would be impossible in the "smart" set, or even amongst the suffragettes. Their inspiration is out of date; we want utilities, not idle dreams and inutilities. What is the music of the spheres, or what are the voices of nature to us in towns? The "call of the spring" is but a whisper, a murmur hardly heard in the home of humanity's "mighty workings." Only at odd moments something in the air, or the skies stirs our pre-occupied minds and flutters our hearts. But we have no time for poetic emotions and thrills; they are not in the day's work. No doubt the reaction will come some day; we shall all turn leisurely and sentimental. The baby poets of our time have a future possibly before them such as was not for the generation which preceded them. They will get an opportunity and exultantly rise to it; we must take care not now to repress the lisping in numbers when the numbers come.

The coming of May naturally brings the neglected poets to our minds, though not a spirit in harmony with theirs. Last week the weather forecast anything rather than the advent of a "merry month." On most days winter was in the air and the skies, forcing itself on our notice, whether or not we had time to attend to its inconsiderate loitering. Though we resolutely went on with our later spring, or summery shopping, we shivered as we bought the lovely light airy materials which pre-suppose sunshine and breezes without the bitter bite of the north and east.

Lord Aberdeen was in London for the marriage of his son, and other important things. Lady Aberdeen remained at the Viceregal Lodge getting happily through the difficulties of convalescence in changeable weather, the changes of which never went far in the direction of comfortable and pleasant ones. Does not downright winter suit the recovery from influenza almost better than a betwixt and between time suits it? We get no temptations then to relax our precautions against a mean enemy that is always lurking round the corner. Nothing lures us from the safe stronghold of a warm and comfortable fireside. Lord Aberdeen has returned to the Viceregal Lodge for this week, when he opens the Dublin International Exhibition in State, and accompanied, it is to be hoped, by Lady Aberdeen. Lord and Lady Grenfell will also be present, and there is to be quite a military display on the occasion to lend it ornament. Many personages are expected to be present. Lord and Lady Pembroke, with several members of their family, have been staying at their Irish residence, Mount Merrion, some few miles from Herbert Park, Lord Pembroke's property, on which the Exhibition Buildings are built. Lord Pembroke is the owner of a very large property in Dublin, and its most flourishing suburbs. The Pembroke family has long held a leading place amongst the great absentee landlord families of Ireland. Sir Antony MacDonnell is also expected to return to the Phœnix Park this week to attend the Exhibition ceremonial, and to join Lady MacDonnell at the Under-Secretary's Lodge. Sir Horace Plunkett was so much identified over here and in society with the "Department," that it is hard to imagine it without him, or him without it. We, who have nothing to do with the politics of the subject, nor with the "economics," nor anything else of the "Department," would be sorry to lose such a popular and genial personality from society as Sir Horace Plunkett. But ignorance is nothing if not confident and hopeful, so without any why or wherefore, we, after the manner of our sex, look to seeing him reappear later on in some position which will give scope to his industrial tastes and talents. Sir Horace now inhabits the fine house he built for himself at Foxrock, seven miles or so south of Dublin, from which he daily motored to his office in Merrion Street. Lord and Lady Ardilaun are coming in early May to stay, as usual, at their residence, St. Anne's, Clontarf. The spring gardens there are beautiful and in every variety. They have been staying at their Connemara place, on the shores of Lough Corrib, where Lady Ardilaun has lately been ill. As we all have the defects of our good qualities, so has a picturesque country of mountains and lakes the inevitable drawback of a damp, misty atmosphere, which gives many ills and chills when the weather is in a specially unamiable mood.—Yours ever,

CLARE.

Macaroni à la St. Denis is a pleasant dish:—

Simmer 4 oz. of large Naples macaroni in salted water, so that it is not broken, strain and cut it in pieces three inches long. Pound 4 oz. of lean white veal, adding 1 oz. of butter, 2 oz. of bread panada, 1 egg, seasoning of salt and pepper, and rub it through a wire sieve, working it afterwards with 2 tablespoonfuls of cream. Put the forcemeat into a bag with a plain pipe, and with it fill the pieces of macaroni. Arrange them in layers in a buttered grating dish, with thick tomato sauce, and a sprinkling of grated Parmesan cheese between each layer. Mix an ounce of grated Parmesan with a little cream, pour it on the top, and bake it a nice colour.

This is a delightful spring salad:—

Wash and scrape a bunch of young carrots, boil them in salted water to which a little butter has been added. Cut a bundle of asparagus into points, keeping the heads separate; cut some boiled new potatoes into slices. Make a close, firm border of the carrots on a dish with the points to the centre, and using a little worked butter to keep them from slipping, arrange the slices of potato, as an inside border, with the green stalk parts of the asparagus on this; and make a nice bouquet with the asparagus points at the summit. Mix 3 tablespoonfuls of salad oil with a scant dessertspoonful of chopped Tarragon, chives, and chervil, and pour it over the salad at the moment of serving.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

P.S.—We have just come from the very pretty wedding of Mr. and Mrs. George Edwardes' charming daughter, Evelyn, with Mr. Cuthbert Sherbrooke. The bride looked sweet in her Romney satin and lace, followed by her two young sisters, also in Romney frocks, looking perfect pictures. The reception at Claridge's included some of the prettiest women in London, and even the three immense reception-rooms were crowded with guests. There was an unusual number of handsome presents, and a small framed list showed the names of friends who had given cheques. I thought this such a good idea.—M.

Inebriety can be Cured.

We guarantee that anyone who has a desire to free himself of these awful curses can do so by taking the Keeley Treatment, and will leave the Institute without the slightest crave or desire for either Alcohol or Drugs.

How often must people be told that drink, after it has reached a certain stage, is a disease, which the poor victim again and again endeavours to throw off, while his friends say: "Use your will power and knock it off!" As well say the same of any other disease; in any case, the disease must be eradicated by scientific treatment.

The Keeley Treatment is always administered by regularly qualified physicians, who have made a special study of Inebriety. After carefully inquiring into the history of each patient, and making a thorough physical examination, they treat each case according to the condition of the patient. No matter how long-standing the addiction, or how much has been taken, the result is invariably the same, a cure.

No constitution is too delicate for the Keeley Treatment, as the remedies are perfectly harmless.

Patients are given the utmost freedom; there is absolutely no confinement, and, until the remedies render it unnecessary, they are allowed their usual amount of alcohol or drugs.

"It really Cures."

"It really cures. It does what it professes to do." Such is the emphatic testimony of Mr. Eardley-Wilmot, the well-known secretary of the Church of England Temperance Society, who for some years has had the Keeley method under close observation in this country. He tells how case after case that had been considered hopeless has yielded speedily to the Keeley Cure, the patients returning to their work full of vigour, and happy in the restoration of all that makes life worth living.

Think! either for yourself or others:

will you allow them or yourself to be utterly destroyed when an absolute cure is at hand?

We can show you hundreds of letters of gratitude from patients who have taken the treatment, and who are willing that their names should be given, or they will correspond direct with prospective patients.

Write us to-day and we will prove to you that this cure is an incontrovertible fact, approved by some of our most eminent men, among them the following: Rev. Canon Fleming, B.D.; the Right Hon. Lord Montagu of Beaulieu; H. W. Forster, Esq., M.P.; Vice-Admiral Woodward, C.B.; Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A.; W. Hind-Smith, Esq.; and Eardley-Wilmot, Esq., R.N., Secretary of the Church of England Temperance Society.

More than half a million

have taken the treatment, among them 17,000 physicians. Does not this fact alone speak volumes? And twenty per cent. of our patients come through the recommendation of their family physician.

About one-third of the patients are ladies, all of whom have apartments outside the Institute, of their own selection.

Private Treatment.

At the constant demand of Patients wishing to be treated privately, we have decided to establish a Physician at a watering-place on the South Coast, where they can be treated without the knowledge of their friends or strangers.

The treatment takes four weeks for alcohol (for drugs five to six weeks), and is carried out in the United Kingdom only at the Keeley Institute, 9, West Bolton Gardens, London, S.W.

Lanchester Locomotion.

In the large and ever increasing world of motorists Lanchester Locomotion has become well-known, it means reliability and easy running, speeds ranging from five to fifty miles per hour on top gear, and comfort both to passengers and driver. So luxuriously smooth and silent is the running of the car that the average person might well remain unaware of the presence of any engine. The motor is almost instantaneously accessible and is simplicity itself, and the general appearance of the Lanchester is luxurious and exclusive to an unusual degree. That the Lanchester is a Smokeless Car is amply proved by the award of the R.A.C. in the Vapour Emission Competition, a Lanchester 20 h.p. Touring Car obtaining 1st place and the Club's Gold Medal. Trial runs may be arranged at any of our Depots. Catalogues free on application.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,476.

In pursuance of my laudable desire to keep our Puzzles up to date, by dealing, as far as possible, with events of the moment, I propose this week to set a Competition upon a subject which is certain to be one of the stock topics of conversation during the next few weeks—viz., the Royal Academy Exhibition.

After mature consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the most convenient form for such a Competition to take will be that of an Anagram.

So I offer, this week, the usual Prize of Two Guineas for

THE BEST ANAGRAM OF THE WORDS "ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION OF PICTURES AT BURLINGTON HOUSE."

The Anagrams sent in by competitors should, like all good Anagrams, contain an appropriate reference to the subject in hand—viz., should be, in some way, descriptive of the Royal Academy.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i.) No Competitor must send in more than one Anagram.
(ii.) All Anagrams must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, May 13, at latest.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,471.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

THE BEST ADVERTISEMENT ANECDOTE, INTRODUCING THE NAMES OF THE GREATEST NUMBER OF FIRMS ADVERTISING IN "TRUTH" OF APRIL 3, 1907.

Rudge Whitworth, I, and daughter came to town, purchased Truth's Cautionary List to make safe, called Knowles', Robinson's, Hampton's, Hackney Furnishing, Catesby's, Spink's, Samuel's, Vickery's, Norman & Stacey, and Belgrave Agency, passed Royal Exchange Assurance at one o'clock by Dent's. Husband took Singer's Cycle to Evans & Co., Mutual Life, Law Guarantee, and Prudential for terms of business, bought Nestor and State Express Cigarettes, picked up Lyon's Powder, Beecham, Wellington's Plates, Sanitas, Jewsbury's Paste, Globe Polish, Celestine, Hieratica, Southall's Towels, and Erasmic Soap, Allen & Hanbury's. Next Bailey's Hotel, lunch with daughter, Apollinaris Water. Husband later sampled Buchanan's, Dewar's, and Cambus Whisky, and obtained Phosferine, Clarke's Mixture, and Electrolysis for nurse, and consulted Goodman's. Mazawattee Tea for us, Fry's Cocoa for child. Used Taylor's Typewriter for patterns of Noble's Serges, prospectuses from Copland & Nye and J. P. White, Irish Distressed Ladies' Fund, Alcoholic Excess and Keeley Cure for inebriate friend, Barnardo's Homes, Waifs & Strays, and Hospital for Incurables. Next day Birkbeck, put a bit on London and Paris Exchange, hired Lanchester Car, rode to Brighton Railway Station, child flung out, tried East London, North-Eastern, and Hospital for Sick Children—admitted there, ordered P. & O. sea voyage (61).—Canning.

Hampton's lace curtains and Knowles's wall-papers supplied by the Hackney Furnishing Co. decorated the Truth Publishing Office where representatives of the Royal Hospital for Incurables, Rugged School Union, Royal Maternity Charity, Waifs and Strays forward movement, Dr. Barnardo's Homes, Church Army, and Great Ormond Street Hospital discussed philanthropic enterprises. The first naturally recommended Shaw's Cure of Cancer, Hauser & Doepfner's Grand Hotel, Naples, the Prudential Assurance Co., and Himrod's Cure for Asthma: the second Copland & Lye's Tweeds and Noble's Serges; the third "Sterile Marriage" (Shelley & Co.); the fourth Tussaud's Exhibition, Hengler's Circus, Maskelyne & Devant's Mysteries, Empire, and Palace theatres; the fifth Sanitas Oil, Ashton & Parsons's Phosferine, Fry's Cocoa, and Beecham's Pills; the sixth Turvey Treatment for Alcoholic Excess, Peebles' Hydropathic Hote, Ingram & Royle's Vichy Cerstine, and Mazawattee Tea; the seventh Children's Competitions (Eva Martin), Allenbury's Diet, Clarke's Blood Mixture, Erasmic Soap, Lyon's Tooth Powder, and Goodman's Inexpensive Artificial Teeth. The chairman wrote minutes on Hieratica with his Taylor Typewriter, consulted the Benson office clock and his Dent watch, handed round Nestor cigarettes, Wolfe's Schnapps, Cambus Whisky, and Apollinaris, ordered his Lanchester Motor, the Rudge-Whitworth and Singer cycles, and invited his colleagues to the Alhambra or London Hippodrome (59).—Whig.

Wilkins made a hurried toilet with the aid of Erasmic Soap, Southall's Compressed Towels, Oriental Tooth Paste, and Seeger's Hair Dye. He wore Viyella underclothing, his linen was Robinson & Cleaver's, and his well-fitting suit by Evans & Co. His ring was from Samuel, his scarf-pin from Reason, and his watch one of Dent's. Having lit a Nestor cigarette, he proceeded to Claridge's in his Lanchester motor. He found Lord Blankney reading "Finance" in a sitting-room with Ronuk polished floor laid with Linola, a Hampton wall-paper, and furniture by Norman & Stacey. "Delighted to see you," cried Blankney. "What will you drink? Dewar's, Cambus, or Buchanan's Whisky and Apollinaris, Wolfe's Schnapps, Cherry Whiskey, Mazawattee Tea, or Fry's Cocoa? I am seedy to-day, and have taken Beecham's Pills, Clarke's Blood Mixture, Vichy Celestins, and Phosferine." "You should try Sanitas Oil, Allenbury's Diet, or Antipon," said Wilkins. "But the Keeley Cure is what you really need." Blankney smiled, displaying a handsome set of Goodman's Artificial Teeth, and lit an Astoria. "Where shall we go to-night? To the Alhambra, Empire, Palace, Hengler's, the Hippodrome, Daly's, the Garrick, Gaiety, Vaudeville, Savoy, Lyric, Aldwych, or the Playhouse"? "First to the Criterion for dinner," said Wilkins (50).—"Tony."

Robinson & Cleaver stopped their Lanchester at the Criterion to test the merits of Dewar's, Cambus, and Buchanan whiskies with Apollinaris, smoke a State Express Cigarette. At Claridge's they met Ethel, who had visited Norman & Stacey's, Dent's, Jeffries, Hampton's, Knowles, and the Hackney previous to house-furnishing. She wore a Viyella blouse and a Noble's Serge. Fragrant with Eau de Cologne, her skin as only Erasmic Soap can make it, her hair dyed by Hinde and teeth from Goodman's resplendent with Jewsbury & Brown's or Dr. Lyon's Powder; a ring from Vickery's or Samuel's, brooch from Spink's, and one of Benson's chains caught my eye. "I have decided on Linola," she said. "Charing Cross Hospital use it, and clean with Scrubb's Ammonia, and polish the wainscot with Ronuk, sprinkling with Sanitas." Ethel suggested a tour by the Great Western. She had been polishing her Singer and Gertrude's Rudge-Whitworth with Globe Polish, and got some Wellington plates for her camera. The men ordered Wolfe's Schnapps and Nestors, but Ethel preferred Mazawattee or Fry's Cocoa in Mortlock's or Goode's beautiful china. "After this, you will require the Turvey or Keeley Treatment, or a course of Phosferine and Beecham's," she remarked (48).—Electron.

Luxuriating in a Belvoir Arbor at the Felix enjoying Truth, the Nineteenth Century, a State Express Cigarette, and a Cherry Whisky and Apollinaris in a superb Goode's tumbler, my wife near wearing a Viyella frock trimmed with Frilled Butter Muslin, reading Memories and drinking Fry's Cocoa, we discussed Queer Stories from "Truth." The Compressed Air Carpet Cleaners' Co. working at Claridge's found an immaculately dressed gentleman in an Evans' suit and Robinson & Cleaver Shirt, unconscious through mistaking Scrubb's Ammonia or Seeger's Hair Dye for Dewar's White Label Whisky. On him were found Halford's Adviser, Daniel Quayne, the Monthly Review, some Nestor Cigarettes, a bill for Diamonds from Spink's, a Mutual Policy, and Hieratica notepaper headed Ritz and Royal Bath Hotels. The Palace and The Playhouse. He was conveyed in a Lanchester Motor, preceded by a porter on a Singer's Cycle to Charing Cross Hospital (the G. N. Central being overcrowded), where he received excellent treatment (Phosferine, Yanatas, Allenbury's Diet, and the Keeley Cure), but soon expired. The interment has been kindly undertaken by the R.S.P.C.A. and the Rugged School Union (41).—Mart.

Israel Rank and Julie de Lespinasse were married from Bailey's Hotel. Unconventionally dressed, he wore a suit of Copland & Lye's Scotch Tweed. She had a Redfern Costume. They caught the Great Western Cornish Express for Torquay, staying at The Imperial Hotel, Torquay. They took Rudge-Whitworth and Singer Bicycles and Wellington Photo Plates, but a telegram from Hamlet & Dulake's, Oxford, about a house, recalled them—they took it, and went up to the Ritz, dined at Claridge's, and went to the Savoy Patience. Next day they chose papers from Knowles' in Chelsea, linen from Robinson & Cleaver, blinds from Hamptons, furniture from Norman & Stacey, and Linola from Catesby. Among their presents is Mazawattee Tea, a Spanish Neck ace from B. M. Archer, Taylor Typewriter, 4711 Eau de Cologne, Clocks from Dent's, Buchanan's Whiskey, and a Lanchester Motor. He gave her a Brilliant and Ruby Ring from Benson's, and Diamond Ornaments from Spink's. She says he is An Obliging Husband. They are abroad, and going to the following places:—Grand Hotel, Bale; Hotel Europe, Lucerne; Hotel d'Angleterre, Vevey; Grand Hotel, Territet; Savoy Hotel, Rome; Hotel Continental, Naples; Grand Hotel, Pisa. They return, and take Canadian Pacific Line to Canada (37).—Qu'appelle.

The Lancaster motor stopped at Bailey's Hotel. "We'll lunch here," said Jack, "and afterwards you can drop me at Evans', while you shop at Harrods'. I'll get the bicycles, a Singer, and a Rudge-Whitworth, go to White's for the garden things, and Dent's about the clock, and then we'll meet at five at the Hackney Furnishing Co.'s." "Oh! no, Norman & Stacey's, Jack." "Very well. Ask Harrod's to send up some Watalu plates, Nestor, and State Express Cigarettes, a dozen Apollinaris, and some Dewar's or Buchanan's Whisky. Or Cambus would do. Oh! yes, and some Wolfe's Schnapps." "My dear Jack! You'll be ready for the Keeley or Turvey treatment." Jack laughed, and laughed more on hearing the result of her campaign. Hieratica stationery, Erasmic Soap, 4711 Eau de Cologne, Jewsbury & Brown's and Lyon's Dentifrices, Fry's Cocoa, Mazawattee, Globe Polish, Sanitas Oil, Phosferine, Beecham's Pills, and Clarke's Blood Mixture made up a surprisingly mixed bag. She found time to write to Catesby, John Noble, Gorringe Heath, and Copland & Lye for patterns, and look in at the Irish Distressed Ladies' Depôt before five. Before dining at the Criterion the unhappy Jack was taken to Hampton's and Knowles' to view wall papers, the Belgrave Agency, Robinson & Cleaver's, Benson's, Vickery's, and Spink's (45).—Sapper.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Knowles were seated in their Belvoir Arbor, he in an Evans' Lounge Suit, studying "Truth" Cautionary List, she, gowned in Copeland & Lye Tweed, sipping Mazawattee, typed on Hieratica with Taylor's Typewriter, commissions for her maid (hired through Belgrave Ladies' Agency) who had placed on White's Garden Table a tray holding bottles of Cambus, Black and White, and Apollinaris. Glancing at her Dent Watch Mrs. Knowles said, "Mary, having finished the Globe Metal polishing, please ride your Singer to Allenbury's. I'll read list. Box of Beecham's Pills, Jewsbury & Brown's Tooth Paste, Lyon's Tooth Powder, Clarke's Blood Mixture, Yanatas." Twenty minutes later, having used Erasmic Soap, Mary, dressed in a Noble costume, started. Passing Vickery's shop she collided with a young man trying to light a Nestor Cigarette on his Rudge-Whitworth. He carried her into Hampton's, bound her head with Robinson & Cleaver handkerchief, sprinkled her with Eau de Cologne 4711, and poured Wolfe's Schnapps down her throat, then conveyed her home in a Lanchester Motor. Arrived there, her master exclaimed: "Thank goodness, I insured her to-day in the Ocean." Finale—an engagement ring from Benson's, and a wedding ring from Spink & Son (35).—Veronica.

Wife and self came to town by G.N. Railway from Fashionable Felixstowe, stayed at Carlton Hotel, dined Dieudonné's. Dewar's Whisky and Apollinaris, Fry's Cocoa, Nestor's Cigarettes, Gaiety Theatre, supped Ritz, Buchanan's and Vichy Water, State Express Cigarettes; Lanchester Motor to Carlton. Bedroom furnished Norman & Stacey with Hackney Furnishing Bedstead, Beecham's Pills, Lyon's Tooth Powder, Viyella nightshirts, Himrod's Asthma Cure, and Sanitas Oil. Morning Seeger's Hairdye, Scrubb's Ammonia, Erasmic Soap, Globe Polish, Jewsbury & Brown Tooth Paste, Clarke's Blood Mixture, Phosferine, Robinson & Cleaver's Handkerchiefs, with Eau de Cologne 4711. Evans' Suit, Noble's Serge Dress, Krutord Corset, Redfern Underclothing, Mazawattee Tea, Allenburys' Diet Food off Mortlock's China; Papers, Truth and Albany. Inspected jewellery, Spink's, Benson, Dent's, Vickery's, bought Cycle at Singer's and Rudge-Whitworth. Saw dinner-service at Goode's, furniture at Hampton's, Polished Floor Ronuk's, a Wolfe's Schnapps, viewed Doré and Shepherd's Gallery, lunched Criterion, Cambus Whisky. Concert at Queen's Hall; Birkbeck Bank; donation Royal Hospital and Barnardo's; prospectus from Mutual, Royal, and Prudential Assurances, Goodman's Teeth. Bought Taylor's Typewriter and Garden Seats at White's, dined at Claridge's, Cherry Whisky, Alhambra, G.W. Rail- way, for P. and O. tour with Yanatas, Watalu Plates, Finance Paper, and some books published by Chatto & Windus (73).—The Prebend.

"Hieratica Paper and Taylor's Typewriter, I bet," she murmured, holding a note, and displaying rings from Samuel and bracelets from Spink. A Gorringe Arbour sheltered her, lounging on a White's garden-chair. Removing her Copeland & Lye cape, she showed a Noble's serge fitted by Redfern over a Sykes corset. A Gorringe hat set off a complexion creditable to Erasmic Soap and Madame Tensfeldt. Eau de Cologne 4711 from her Robinson & Cleaver handkerchief overpowered the aroma of Sanitas Oil supplied by Allen & Hanbury. A table from the Hackney Furnishing Co. held a Benson spirit-case (containing Dewar and Buchanan), Vichy, and boxes of Ardath Co. and Nestor cigarettes. Glancing at her Dent's watch she entered a Linola-floored hall, rendered spotless by the Compressed Air Cleaning Co., and artistic by Knowles and Hampton. A Singer Cycle and Wellington Developing Plates indicated the occupier's taste. On a Norman & Stacey table stood Mazawattee Tea and Fry's Cocoa, while Wolfe's Schnapps and Apollinaris betokened man was expected. Hark! A Lanchester Car! Swallowing a Phosferine Tonic and seizing Chatto & Windus's latest, she waits! . . . . . "Guess I hooked him safe as Birkbeck Bank," she exclaimed, a smile advertising Lyon's Tooth-powder and Jewsbury and Brown's Paste (42).—Detinu.

A Treatise on Options.—In a Belvoir Wicker Arbour at the Peebles Hydropathic, smoking a fragrant Nestor, clad in Noble's Serge suiting, an Apollinaris and Cambus within reach, sat a bridegroom, a member of the Stock Exchange. Opposite reclined his bride, dressed in Copeland & Lye's 'Kelvindale,' drinking Fry's Cocoa. Benson Gems sparkled on her fingers as she took out a Dent's Watch. They had returned from bicycling, his Rudge-Whitworth and her Singer shining with Globe Polish. Opening a letter, addressed by a Smith-Premier Typewriter, she exclaimed: "A cheque on Birkbeck's for £1,000! Shall I buy a new Lanchester?" "You must decide, darling; but we have one motor," and he handed her Truth, opened at p. 859. She read of the children's needs, and went indoors. Presently she returned with cheques to Barnardo's Homes, Invalid Children's Aid, Great Ormond Street Hospital, East London Children's Hospital, Waifs and Strays, Prevention of Cruelty to Children, North-Eastern Children's Hospital. Kissing her bridegroom, she said, "You are An Obliging Husband. You have given me a better pick-me-up than Schnapps, a better tonic than Phosferine. I have reserved a little for Truth's Toy Show and Truth's Sixpences" (31).—Sebrof.

Clarke's Blood Mixture, Ashton & Parson's, Ltd., Phosferine Tonic, Vichy Celestins for Gout, Himrod's Asthma Cure long defied "mors." Rudge-Whitworth and Singer Bicycles he discarded, substituting a beautiful Lanchester Motor Co.'s car. Allenburys' Diet and F. S. Turney's Cancer Cure procured longevity. Treatises on Options interested, "Truth's" Queer Stories amused "Truth" Cautionary Lists guided him. Chatto & Windus's publications, John Lane's Albany, John Murray's Reviews, Taylor's, Ltd., Typewriter, Hieratica, and John Heath's Birmingham Pens adorned his table. He died. Investments with Mutual Life Insurance Co., New York, Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Law Guarantee and Trust Society, the stud's sale by W. & S. Freeman of Aldridge's provided for Reginald his son. Finsbury Distillery Co.'s Wolfe's Schiedam Schnapps, Dewar's Whiskey, Edinburgh Distillers Co.'s Cambus Scotch, Buchanan's Black and White abundantly (neglecting Apollinaris, Mazawattee Tea or Fry's Cocoa), Ardath Tobacco Co.'s State Express and Nestor Cigarettes to excess necessitated Kelly's and Turvey's Cures for Drink and Drug Habit. Starkie's Yanatas for Seasickness not required. What cures love? At Mischa Elman's Concert, Queen's Hall, they met. Criterion's Eastroom heard love whisperings. Alice in Noble's Cream Serge, a Vickery's Novelty Brooch, complexion enhanced by Erasmic Soap, illuminated by Godman's Artificial Teeth was beautiful. Our blessings! (40).—Businecz.

Lady Betty looked smart in a costume from Copeland & Lye's, the sleeves lined with Gorringe's Frilled Butter Muslin, smoking a Nestor Cigarette, and idly playing with her handkerchief from Robinson & Cleaver's scented with Eau de Cologne, her fingers adorned with rings from Spink's, Benson's, and Samuel's, and wearing a Vickery's Novelty Brooch. She was staying at Bailey's Hotel, London, whose rooms were furnished by the Hackney Furnishing Co., the walls papered by Chas. Knowles, and the comfortable chairs supplied by Hampton's and Norman & Stacey. Glancing at one of Dent's Clocks, hastily got her Heath's Pen and Hieratica Notepaper, and writing to Madge, asked if she would come on her Singer's Cycle, and have a cup of Mazawattee or Fry's Cocoa, and bring her husband on his Rudge-Whitworth, as his Lanchester was broken, he could be supplied with Dewar's or Buchanan's Whisky, but he said on arriving if he could not have either Cambus Pure Scotch or Wolfe's Schnapps, he would drink Apollinaris. Madge, who looked well in one of Noble's Serges, and complexion bright with use of Erasmic, explained how ill her husband was, and had been taking Allenbury's, Phosferine, Beecham's Pills, and Himrod's Cure for Asthma (33).—Neale.

BALDNESS CURED AT EIGHTY-FOUR.

Remarkable Evidence of a well-known London Consultant on Disorders of the Hair.

It is of course obvious that when middle-aged or young people find that their hair is falling out, either in large or in small quantities, that there must be some unhealthy condition of the scalp which is leading to such baldness, or that the treatment to which they are subjecting their hair is an incorrect one.

To the ordinary mind such cases do not seem at all serious. The right remedy being adopted, the hair will grow again as a matter of course.

But when, with advancing years, the hair begins to fall, then it is a different matter. "Baldness and age go together," say some. "You cannot cure that."

This is a fallacy. With proper treatment hair need never be lost, and, in fact, in many cases a new crop can be grown, no matter how old the individual concerned may be.

Take the following case, really a remarkable instance of the truth of our contention:—

A gentleman, eighty years of age, who had been suffering from a complication of scalp troubles, irritation, scurf accumulations, and falling hair, came for advice to Mr. Warner Oliver, the well-known consultant in disorders of the hair, of 4, Holles-street, Cavendish-square, London, W.

Mr. Warner Oliver examined him, and prescribed the course of treatment he thought would have the desired effect. The patient was not a good one, in the sense that his health was somewhat frail. And yet, not in months, but in a few weeks only, a cure was effected.

If we only knew more about our hair we should not have such false ideas about these questions of baldness, greyness, etc. Nearly all these cases can be cured. We therefore strongly advise our readers to write to Mr. Warner Oliver, at 4, Holles-street, Cavendish-square, London, W., for a copy of his standard work on the hair. It is fully illustrated, most interestingly written, and will be sent free of all charge or obligation to any address. Please mention whether you are Mr., Mrs., or Miss, so that this book may be correctly addressed.

THE

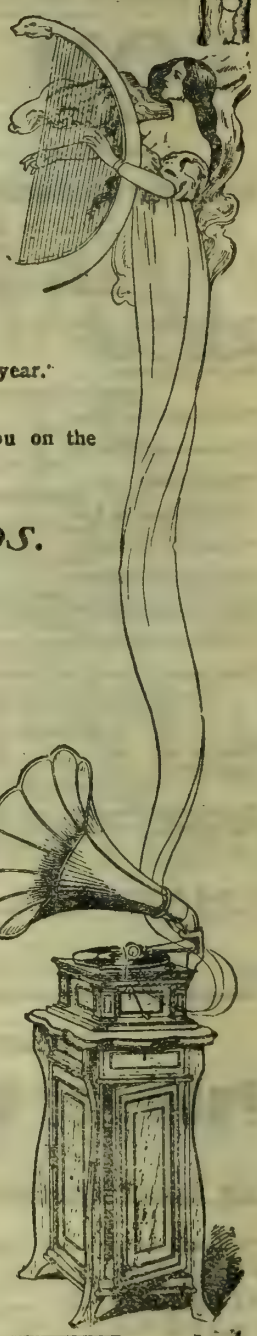
OF TO-DAY MUST NOT BE JUDGED BY THE PAST.



Madame ADELINA PATTI sums this up in one short sentence. Writing recently from Craig-y-Nos Castle, the great diva says: "The Gramophone of to-day I find is such an improved instrument for recording the human voice to the older machines with which many of us are familiar, that my hitherto objection to allow the thousands who cannot hear me sing personally, to listen to the reproduction of my voice through the instrumentality of the Gramophone is now quite removed."

Madame MELBA writes:

"I am delighted with my latest Records. Your wonderful Gramophone improves year by year."

Signor CARUSO writes:

"I am indeed satisfied with my new Records. They are magnificent, and I congratulate you on the great improvement you have made in the last year."

GRAMOPHONE & TYPEWRITER, LTD., 21, City Road, London, E.C.

COVENT GARDEN AND ITS OPERA.

OPERA has begun, and by all the tokens it is going to be a very interesting season. We are having the "Ring" again and "Die Meistersinger" à la Bayreuth, and new works (to London) such as Catalani's "Loreley" and Mascagni's "Iris," and old-new ones such as "La Gioconda" and "Hansel und Gretel," and plenty of Puccini, and Melba and Caruso (to name only a few of the "leading lines"), and, altogether, if there is not something for every one in the Bow-street lucky-bag this year it will certainly not be the fault of the management. We all criticise Covent Garden at times, but, when all is said and done, it is really a very wonderful institution. One fact in particular should always be borne in mind, though it is sometimes overlooked. Covent Garden is the nearest approach which we have at present to a national opera house, but it is run very differently from those of the Continent. With us subscription takes the place of subvention, and on the principle that those who pay the piper have a right to call the tune, it follows that the wishes of the subscribers can never be neglected by the management. When, therefore, this and that opera is proposed, which there is reason to believe would not enjoy general favour, it is just as well to bear in mind that even the best-intentioned directorate has not an entirely free hand in these matters, but, on the contrary, is compelled to consult the greatest happiness of the greatest number.

This is, of course, the defence of the management when it is complained that they do not give more attention to native opera. Without pretending to be in the secrets of Bow-street, I have not the slightest doubt that Mr. Higgins and his coadjutors would be only too delighted to mount and run English opera if they could only find one which would draw. Nay, not only at Covent Garden, but all the world over, the same principle holds. Berlin and Paris would welcome a really remunerative opera, whether it came from England or Peru, just as readily as Covent Garden. The unfortunate part of the matter is that the chances of one country or the other producing such a work seem at the present time about equal. It is said that when at rare intervals native works have been produced at Covent Garden they have not been properly pushed. Sufficiently persistent efforts have not been made, it is asserted, to ensure them permanent favour.

To this there are two replies. In the first place, it is urged, and the cogency of the argument is hard to resist, that an opera house such as Covent Garden, relying solely on its aforesaid subscribers and the general public, cannot fairly be expected to mount works time after time which fail to attract. In other words, Covent Garden is a business enterprise which, though not conducted primarily with a view to dividends, cannot afford to disregard financial considerations entirely. Secondly, it is replied that the hard logic of the counting-house does not support the suggestion that by a policy of sticking to it in these cases the management would eventually "win through." It costs between £800 and £900 to "lift the curtain" every night at Covent Garden, and without disclosing any state secrets, few probably will be surprised to learn that when English operas have been presented the receipts have not been on a corresponding scale. Nor have they in the case of subsequent performances revealed that upward tendency which might have justified a policy of pegging away. Otherwise, one may be sure the management would have been only too pleased to adopt the latter policy in the hope of getting some of their money back. But if it only means throwing good money after bad they can hardly do this.

Somewhat similar considerations apply in the case of native singers. The Syndicate gladly employ these when they can get hold of the right article, but they cannot afford to run any risks. They can only make use of thoroughly trained artists whose capabilities are assured. There is no room for amateurs or novices in a season run under Covent Garden conditions. The thing can only be done with the aid of the most experienced artists, ready to undertake their parts at a moment's notice, if necessary without even a rehearsal, and the number of such to be found in the ranks of our native singers is unfortunately strictly limited. In the meantime we have such admirable artists as Mme. Kirkby Lunn and Mme. Agnes Nicholls to go on with and to encourage others to come and do likewise. As for the rest, they hail from all quarters. The only difficulty is to sift the good from the bad, and get hold of the right people. Year by year Mr. Pitt hies him to the Fatherland with splendid optimism, in the hope of discovering at last a German tenor who can really sing, while other trusted representatives of the Syndicate report on all the most promising new arrivals elsewhere. It is the rarest thing for any vocalist to appear at Covent Garden who has not withstood this preliminary test, for experience has shown that local reputations are apt to prove misleading if relied on too implicitly.

Then when the songbirds have all been mustered, the next problem is to fit them all in so as to get the full benefit of their services, and this is by no means so easy a task as might be supposed. The question is sometimes asked whether the répertoire is decided on first and the singers chosen accordingly, or are the operas picked to suit the artists? It rather suggests the problem of the chicken and the egg, but the answer is, I imagine, that now one and now the other course prevails. What is, at any rate, certain is that an opera cannot be given without the requisite singers. Every artist engaged supplies a list of the parts which he or she is prepared to undertake, and I have heard it rather wickedly asserted by those experienced in such matters that the extent of the répertoire boasted is usually in inverse ratio to the capability of the performer. Certain it is that few are called on to appear in more than a limited number of the parts on their list. All the leading artists are guaranteed so many performances, and it is one of the problems of the managerial mind to ensure that they get the requisite number of appearances, seeing that these have to be paid for in any event. On the other hand, when from any cause an artist is prevented from appearing, he in turn suffers loss of his fee for that night—a circumstance which, if more generally understood, would perhaps go to mitigate some of the indignation aroused when this or that unfortunate artist is compelled to disappoint an audience. On the other hand, the arrangement may possibly help to account for the fact that on the whole such disappointments are so few.

From the managerial standpoint, the task of accommodating all the different singers is at times exceedingly complex. So many performances, so many artists, and so many operas—it sounds simple enough, and doubtless, if such things as colds and "indisposition" were unknown, the whole thing could be worked out quite nicely before the season started, and carried through without a hitch. In practice, however, it falls out very differently. This or that leading artist will be unable to appear on a given night, and therewith upset the whole scheme projected. Then, too, there are the subscribers' requirements always to be borne in mind. If the Wednesday and Saturday folk get better fare than those of Tuesday and Friday, the management will soon hear of it. There must be a suitable ringing of the changes, too, on the various classes of opera, and so on. Matters are further complicated, moreover, by the question of rehearsals. Artists will not rehearse when they are singing in the evening. Some even will not rehearse on the day before and the day after, while others go further still, and specially stipulate for so many days' rest before and after such and such a part, so many before and after such another one, and so on. It is easy to understand the additional difficulties thus introduced. Yet again, scenic considerations have often to be borne in mind. As it is, the stage hands have not infrequently to be working all through the night to make the requisite changes.

How many of those who sit at their ease in stalls and boxes appreciate these and other trials which beset a long-suffering management? Here, as elsewhere, it may be truly said that to know all is to excuse all. If Covent Garden, like every other human institution, sometimes falls short of perfection, the wonder must be to any one acquainted with the facts that, as a whole, it does so well.

SINGERS THEN AND NOW.

Vocally, the singers of to-day may or may not equal their predecessors, but in one respect at any rate they fall below the latter. They are certainly less entertaining. Whether it be due to their superior education, greater respect for the conventions, or less genius, it would be rash, perhaps, to say; but certainly our latter-day song birds indulge as a rule in few or none of those eccentricities of conduct for which so many of their predecessors were renowned. For that matter, audiences and performers alike would seem to have fallen away from the earlier standard in this respect. Where are the opera-goers of to-day to take up the cause of contemporary rivals as did those who supported the claims of Cuzzoni and Faustina in an earlier age? These were the singers, it will be remembered, on whose behalf partisanship ran so high that when they appeared in the same opera neither could be heard for the mingled demonstrations of friend and foe.

The situation was profitable for a time, but eventually became a nuisance to the management, who brought it to an end in an ingenious manner. Cuzzoni had taken a solemn oath that she would never accept less than her rival, and knowing this, the managers cruelly offered her one guinea less per annum than they were paying Faustina, and thereby effected their dastardly purpose. Yet of the two Cuzzoni seems to have produced the greater effect. How would Mr. Neil Forsyth take it, for instance, if to-day some ardent galleryite rose in his place and shouted concerning one of our latter-day prime donne, "Damn her! She has a nest of nightingales in her belly"?

But Cuzzoni was, of course, only one of many singers of an earlier time who called forth like demonstrations —both vocal and otherwise. The utterance of the lady who rose in her box and exclaimed, "One God and one Farinelli" is, of course, historic. The story of Caffarelli may also be recalled under this head. While he was singing at Naples he was told of the arrival of Gizziello at Rome, and posted all the way to hear him, and having done so, rose in his seat, exclaimed, "Bravo, bravissimo Gizziello! E Caffarelli chi te lo dice!" and fled precipitately from the theatre. What would not the halfpenny papers make of such an event if it happened nowadays! This was the Caffarelli, too, who had proclaimed himself the equal of "two Farinellis," who complained that the snuff box sent him by Louis XV. was not the equal of those given to ambassadors (remarking perfectly truly that "All the ambassadors of the world would not make one Caffarelli"), and who inscribed over the gateway of his palace, "Amphion Thebas, ego domum."

Of Gizziello in turn it is recorded that when he first heard Farinelli he burst into tears, and then, whether from chagrin, despair, or joy is not quite clear, fainted right away. I wonder if any modern tenor listening to, say, Signor Caruso, has been similarly affected. Still more striking was the triumph of Farinelli when he appeared for the first time on the same stage with Senesino. Senesino, we are told, had the part of a furious tyrant to represent, and Farinelli that of an unfortunate hero in chains; but in the course of the first song he so softened the obdurate heart of the enraged tyrant that Senesino, forgetting his stage character, ran to Farinelli and embraced him in his arms. No doubt the sensation was great. One can picture the situation, perhaps, by imagining what would happen if, in "La Tosca" Scotti as Scarpia was similarly overcome by the seductive strains of Caruso's Cavaradossi.

Senesino was one of the last of the detestable male soprani, and he was also, like General Bangs, "a most immoral man," differing greatly in this respect from Farinelli, whom he so greatly admired. But it was not always with admiration for one another's talents that the old-time singers were affected. Of Ansani, for instance (to whom through various masters the late Manuel Garcia traced his artistic lineage), it is told that the sweetness of his voice was equalled only by the unloveliness of his temper, with the result that he could not hear his humblest rival without signifying his contempt and scorn. Nay, even his own wife was not exempt, so that when she was appearing he would betake himself to the pit and hiss.

In scanning the records of these earlier days, one thought always obtrudes itself. How much can one really believe of the strange proceedings and marvellous achievements ascribed to these singers of the past? Did they really produce such astounding results as we are bidden to believe? Or were audiences more impressionable then than now? It is difficult to say. Nor is it necessary to go back so very far to reach the region of the fabulous in this regard. Consider, for instance, that striking anecdote which used to be told by the late Julius Stockhausen concerning the singing of his mother, and the celebrated J. B. Cramer. "At a concert rehearsal in London my mother was singing Mozart's Recitative and Rondo, 'Ch' io mi scordi di te,' with orchestra and pianoforte obbligato. Cramer, then already advanced in years, was at the piano; towards the end of the performance he was so overcome by the delivery of the singer that he fell upon his knees and continued to play his part in that posture. 'These are sounds from above, sounds worthy of adoration,' he said, when my mother had finished." It is fortunate, perhaps, that all singers do not produce such powerful effects—or that all accompanists are not so impressionable. The spectacle of Mr. Hamilton Harty, say, succumbing to his emotions in like fashion while playing a difficult accompaniment by Brahms or Strauss would certainly provoke astonishment.

An anecdote which may pair off with the foregoing, perhaps, is that narrated by Mr. Hermann Klein in relation to Jenny Lind, who, he says (in his volume of musical reminiscences) was so carried away by her singing of Agathe's prayer from "Der Freischütz" at a concert at Norwich on one occasion, that she fell on her knees on the platform, and so finished the air. Why do such things never happen nowadays?

THE BITTER CRY OF THE UNEMPLOYED.

[By One of Them.]

Let me admit at once that I am not a "star"—even of the fourth or fifth magnitude. Not for me are the triumphs of Caruso or the fees of Melba; in a word, I am one of the rank and file, and bitterly am I made to realise that fact. Formerly there was a place for me and my like. Being possessed of what the reporters call a prepossessing appearance and agreeable manner, I specialised in "at homes" and minor musicales, whereby I contrived to earn an honest if exiguous existence. My engagements in the season were numerous. I obtained my two, three, or five guineas in each instance, and with a small teaching connection in addition (recruited mainly from the offspring of the more opulent tradesmen of the genteel suburb in which I dwell), I contrived to keep my creditors at bay and even on occasion to put a trifle by. Alas! how differently stands the case to-day! My drawing-room engagements are in the nature of a rapidly vanishing quantity, and but for the noble resolve of my grocer's daughter to emulate the flights of Melba and the equally resolute determination of her friends to outshine the efforts of Mme. Clara Butt, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, and the rest, my position at the present time would be precarious indeed.

Yet, as I venture to declare in all humility, my voice is as good as ever, and I employ it no less tastefully than before. My moral character no breath of scandal has ever touched. I have never failed to conduct myself with the strictest propriety, and in the consumption of stimulants, when such have been provided, I have been aghast at my own moderation. In all other respects, moreover, I have been the soul of discretion and circumspection. When my hostess has mistaken me for the head waiter and consulted me as to the quality of the ices, I have never displayed the smallest resentment. I have laughed immoderately at the crudest witticisms of my most offensive hosts. I have never committed the error of singing Strauss where Sullivan was preferred, or of giving that Bacchanalian ditty "Drinking" to an audience sighing for the more recondite strains of Debussy. In a word, I have left nothing undone to secure my advancement in the calling which I have made my own. Yet my experience has been that recorded—my popularity has waned, my engagements have diminished, and bid very soon at the present rate to vanish altogether. Moreover, and it is this which lends pathos to my tale, my case is only one of many. On every hand, where two or three singers of my class are gathered together, the cry is the same. The musicale market has never been more depressed. The slump in drawing-room entertainments within recent years has been perfectly appalling.

What is the explanation? Alas! it is only too obvious. Two fell and sinister agencies have worked our ruin—the motor-car and the bridge party. In June and July Mrs. Dedley Boreham's "At Home (Music 4—7)" seems more than usually unattractive to the possessor of a smart Daimler or Mercédès offering such limitless possibilities of escape therefrom. And, in the same way, who does not think twice and even thrice of inviting his or her friends to such a form of entertainment who has ready to hand a means of enjoyment so infinitely more seductive? What wonder, therefore, that the vocal artist withers while the motor is more and more?

As for bridge, that diabolical pastime completes the ruin which the automobile has begun. The youthful hostess of West Kensington or South Hampstead, who formerly invited her friends to a little music and requisitioned for their entertainment the services of such modest and inexpensive professionals as myself, to-day finds a bridge party at once a simpler, less costly, and more attractive entertainment, and, in the result, the minor musicale would seem to have become almost a thing of the past. Others have been hit, I am told, equally hard in the same way. Ask the West-End tradesman for one. The art of shopping, he will tell you, bids fair to become a lost one, and all on the same account. The all-devouring automobile and the seductive bridge party engage to-day exclusive attention.

But with this aspect of the matter I am not concerned. The decline of the musicale is the burden of my tale of woe. Is it idle to add the hope that it may not fall on ears rendered wholly deaf by the clatter of the petrol engine and the curses, not loud but deep, of the bridge table?

SOME FORTHCOMING CONCERTS.

Concerts seem likely to be numerous as ever during the next few weeks, beginning with the Santley Jubilee concert at the Albert Hall to-day (Wednesday). Kreisler will be heard at the Queen's Hall Orchestra's Symphony concert on Thursday afternoon, and in the evening that great pianist, Mme. Sophie Menter, will make her reappearance after many years' absence at the Philharmonic concert; Herr Jan Sibelius was also to have come, but he has disappointed. On the same evening at the Bechstein Hall Mr. Mallinson gives the first of a series of song recitals. On Saturday the reappearance of little Von Vecsey (now, we are told, a sturdy youth scorning knickerbockers) will have interest for many, and Godowsky will be heard for the last time this summer. Another prodigy in little Pepito Arriola will play again at the Albert Hall on Sunday. Monday brings another London Symphony Orchestra's concert under Safonoff, "the bâtonless wonder." Miss Myrtle Elvyn, who makes her début on Tuesday, is a pretty American girl, and a pupil of Godowsky, of whom report speaks favourably. May 8 will be a melancholy date for many, since De Pachmann, the one and only, then takes leave of his London admirers for the terrible space of two years. On the same afternoon Mlle. Landi gives a recital at Leighton House, and on the 14th she will be heard again at the Bechstein Hall, when her programme will include some songs in Spanish. On May 11 the first of two Saturday afternoon concerts by the London Choral Society will constitute something of a new departure. Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Dalila" is the work to be given.

On the 13th the London Symphony Orchestra will be heard again under Safonoff (still bâtonless), while on the 15th Mr. Mark Hambourg and Mme. Sophie Menter both give recitals. On May 16 Mischa Elman will play the Beethoven violin concerto at the Philharmonic, and Strauss's "Don Juan" will be given "for the first time at these concerts." Little Vivien Chartres is down to perform on May 18, and a prodigy of another kind in Kussewitzky, who is said to do wonders on the double-bass, will be heard on the 22nd. Mlle. Chaminade, most popular of latter-day lady composers, gives a recital of her own works on the 23rd, and for those who like more solid fare there will be a London Symphony Orchestra concert on the same afternoon under Señor Arbos. On this date also a new violin prodigy, Edith von Voigtländer (aged thirteen), of whom rumour says much, is to make her first appearance. On May 25 Mme. Kirkby Lunn gives an afternoon recital at Bechstein Hall, Mr. Backhaus will assemble his admirers at the Queen's Hall, and in the evening Mme. Marie Brema is to sing at a concert given by Miss Mathilde Verne, with the Queen's Hall Orchestra. Mlle. Landi sings again on the 28th, and on the following day Mischa Elman gives a concert with the London Symphony Orchestra under Herr Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has not visited London before, as conductor. Miss Beatrice Harrison, sister of the clever young violinist Miss May Harrison, and described herself as a most promising 'cellist, makes her début on the same afternoon with the Queen's Hall Orchestra. The next day will be a busy one, with a Queen's Hall Orchestra concert in the afternoon (at which M. Raoul Pugno will play), another Gerhardt-Nikisch recital, and the last Philharmonic in the evening, at which Lady Hallé will be the chief soloist. Miss Nellie Curzon-Smith, who makes her début on the following day, comes from Berlin, where she has studied at the Hochschule by all accounts to excellent purpose.

So much for May. For June the record is at present less crowded, though a good many fixtures have already been arranged. Mrs. George Swinton, Miss Ethel Leginska, Mr. Boris Hambourg, Mr. Percy Grainger, Mr. Hugo Heinz, and Mischa Elman are some of many artists giving concerts in the earlier part of the month. On the 14th, Mme. Yvette Guilbert will be with us for the first of a series of her fascinating matinées, Mlle. Johanne Stockmarr, the clever Danish pianist, giving a recital on the same afternoon. On the 16th, M. Edouard de Reszke will sing at one of the Albert Hall Sunday concerts, and the following day the first of the postponed Joachim Quartet concerts will draw the faithful to the Bechstein Hall. An interesting feature of the programme of these concerts this time will be the inclusion of nine of the string quartets of Haydn, and also some rarely heard works of Mozart. The remaining concerts of this series will take place on June 21, 24, 26, and 29, and July 1, at the Bechstein Hall, and June 19 at the Queen's Hall. On June 18 a recital by M. Paderewski, who has not been heard in London for quite a long time now, will be an event of note; on June 25, Mr. Gervase Elwes has arranged to give a recital of English songs at the Bechstein Hall, while right at the end of the month, on the afternoon of the 29th, the farewell concert of Mme. Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford is safe to draw a huge audience to the Albert Hall.

As time runs on many other interesting appearances will doubtless be arranged, but those above referred to are sufficient to indicate that the needs of the concert-goer will be amply provided for during the next two months.

NOTES.

Now that the "Ring" under Bayreuth conditions has become a hardy annual at Covent Garden it is amusing to recall some of the fears and misgivings which attended the first performance of the work in this manner in 1898. The notion of doing "Das Rheingold" without a break in particular excited the gravest fears, while the suggestion of adopting the Bayreuth plan and excluding late comers caused many worthy folks to foam at the mouth. People who arrived late and could not get in, it was declared, would certainly demand the return of their money, while those who wearied of the gods and their troubles and could not get out would invoke habeas corpus and have the law on the syndicate—for which purpose the proximity of Bow-street police court would obviously be a great convenience.

On the stage as well as off those early "Ring" performances had their humorous features. For particulars of one such Frl. Ternina herself was authority. This was the substitution of the chorus director for the corpse of Siegfried at the end of "Götterdämmerung." Herr Krauss, it seems, with a sad lack of enthusiasm, objected to play the part of a dead man, while Ternina bemoaned his fate in Brünnhilde's long-drawn accents, so the gentleman who directed the chorus, nothing loth, hastily assumed the hero's garments and took his place on the bier—thence supervising matters in ease and comfort. But it was hardly surprising that the arrangement did not commend itself to Ternina.

"I enclose voice and photo." Has it really come to this? An American paper says so. Operatic artists in future, when negotiating with distant impresarios, will simply enclose a gramophone record containing two or three of their happiest efforts, and the contract will be concluded without further difficulty. Well, well! What next?

Apropos of "canned music" (as Sousa called it), some of the latest records of the Gramophone Company must be heard to be believed. Slowly but surely, and not so slowly either, the mechanical processes involved have been perfected, until nowadays the results achieved partake of the miraculous. Close your eyes in some cases, and it is almost impossible to believe that one is not listening to the original, so completely has the effect of any reproducing medium been eliminated. Hear those selections from "The Gondoliers" and "The Yeomen of the Guard," for instance, by the Coldstreams Band, and you may fancy yourself in Hyde Park or at Earl's Court without the smallest effort. The Symphony Orchestra, of La Scala, Milan, is responsible also for some fine orchestral numbers, while as a tour de force "The Coming of the Year," played by church bells with organ accompaniment, is quite amazing in the volume of sound produced—or should one say suggested? Some remarkable "spoken" records have also been recently issued, including a recitation of "The Bells" by Canon Fleming, which is as astonishing in its way as any of the musical items. What would we not give to have the voices of some of the great ones of the past preserved in similar fashion?

PERSONALIA.

It has often been stated of Richter, who is once more the hero of the hour at Covent Garden, that he can play every instrument in the orchestra. But that is, of course, an exaggeration, though he certainly knows how every instrument ought to be played, and in earlier days was master himself of, at any rate one—to wit, the horn. He studied the violin, too, in earlier days, and that he is also a good pianist may be gathered from the fact that at the age of ten he appeared in this capacity at a concert given by his mother—a well-known opera singer of her day.

Richter can be stern at times, and he also knows the value of satire. During the rehearsal of a certain musical festival the famous conductor was disturbed by someone in the hall beating time on the floor. Richter endured it for some time and then, turning round, requested the offender in his broken English to desist. "You see," he explained with a smile, "when I am conducting I cannot always keep time with your foot."

Leopold Godowsky, who gives next Saturday his last recital in London for the season, has now been playing in London for the best part of twenty years, though it is comparatively recently that his extraordinary talents have been generally recognised. For sheer mastery of the keyboard he is probably the greatest of all living pianists. Even Rosenthal can hardly have performed such wonders. With wrists of steel he has fingers of velvet, and the brilliancy of his execution is equalled only by the amazing delicacy and beauty of his touch.

Godowsky, who was born at Wilna, is at home in every European capital, and has spent a good many years, too, in America, where he was director for some time of the Chicago Conservatoire. He is married, and has a delightful little daughter, of whom many quaint stories are told. Once she was asked by her mother: "Why do you pack away your toys so carefully?" "I am going to save them for my children," answered the little girl. "But suppose you should never have any children?" continued Mrs. Godowsky. "Oh, then I'll give them to my grandchildren," was the unexpected reply.

Mischa Elman, whose appearances are to be numerous during the coming season, was once asked how he had learnt to play as he does, and his reply was characteristic—for this amazing youngster has a keen sense of humour: "I mustn't tell you, for then you would be able to play as well as I can!" Mischa was good enough to admit, however, that he had benefited greatly from the "Ten Commandments" of his master, M. Auer, and for the rest confessed to his method of studying a new work. "I read it and think of it till I know it by heart before I play a note. Then, when I come to give it in public, I force myself to imagine that there is no other composer and no other such piece in the world."

But Mischa is anything but a youth of one idea. In his school days at St. Petersburg he headed all his comrades in mathematics. Pushkin is his favourite author and cycling is his delight. At the same time his tastes are simple, though he has the means nowadays to do whatever he chooses. Mischa Elman's father, by the way, was offered £30,000 a year or so ago for the temporary control of his son's musical services. That offer was, however, declined with thanks, and with very good reason. Since then Mischa has received as much as 400 guineas for a single performance at a private party. He is, in fact, in a fair way to amass the largest sum in fees ever acquired by an executive musician since the beginning of the world.

Mme. Yvette Guilbert, who will soon be delighting us again, began her career in the trying-on department of one of the big drapery establishments in Paris. Now she gives some people fits elsewhere. But she never will have it herself that her repertoire is not beyond reproach. Her songs, she declares, are not naughty, but merely un peu légère. Voilà tout!

All may not know that it was not in Paris but in Belgium that she made her first success. For some time she had appeared in minor Parisian theatres and second-rate music-halls without attracting attention. She was even dismissed from the Eldorado because she "did not sing like the others." Then she went to Liège, where her rendering of the songs of Xanrof so entranced the students that she was asked to go to Brussels forthwith, and when she reappeared in Paris again it was for very different fees from those she had received before.

A singer of a very different order, who will also be visiting us shortly, is Camilla Landi. In the opinion of many there is no greater vocalist before the public to-day. Others may have finer voices, but who can sing as she does? In grave and gay, sacred and secular, her art is equally consummate and individual. Yet how little the general public knows of her. Her fame has not yet reached the suburbs.

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1584. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, May 8, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. Cheques and Post Office Orders should be made Payable to the Manager, Truth, "Truth Buildings," Carteret-street, S.W.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE King arrived at Buckingham Palace on Saturday evening from Paris, en route from Naples. His Majesty has been absent from England for nearly nine weeks, as he left London for Paris, on the way to Biarritz, on Monday, March 4. The King will reside at Buckingham Palace (except for a brief absence at Newmarket next week) until Saturday, the 18th, when the Court will remove to Windsor Castle until Monday, the 27th.

I hear that the King is to be the guest of Lord Yarborough at Brocklesby Park when he visits the Royal Agricultural Society's show at Lincoln during the last week of June. Lord Yarborough is this year the President of the Society, and he will hold the office until June 26, when he is to be succeeded by Mr. Victor Cavendish. The King and Queen (then Prince and Princess of Wales) were the guests of Lord Yarborough and his mother, Victoria Lady Yarborough, at Brocklesby when they visited Great Grimsby in July, 1879, for the purpose of opening the Alexandra Dock. It is expected that the Prince of Wales will be the guest of Lord Londesborough at Blankney Hall during the show week.

As the Queen has lengthened her stay in the South of Europe there will be neither a Court nor a State Ball at Buckingham Palace before Whitsuntide. I hear that the two remaining Courts are to be held during the first fortnight of June, before the King and Queen leave Buckingham Palace to spend Ascot race week at Windsor Castle, and the King and Queen of Denmark will be present at one of these ceremonials. The first State Ball will be given during the same period while King Frederick and Queen Louise are in London. The second State Ball is to take place early in July.

Her Majesty has prolonged her cruise on board the Victoria and Albert for the sake of Princess Victoria, who has been in delicate health for some time past, and it is hoped that she may derive increased benefit from her stay in the south of Europe by spending an additional fortnight in the Mediterranean.

The home engagements of King Frederick and Queen Louise will oblige them to limit their stay in England to five days, during which period they will be the State guests of the King and Queen at Buckingham Palace. The King and Queen of Denmark will land at Portsmouth from the Royal yacht on Saturday, June 8, coming most likely from Cherbourg after their official visit to Paris. On leaving England they will embark at Port Victoria for Flushing on Thursday, the 13th. A State Banquet and a State Ball are to be given at Buckingham Palace during the visit of King Frederick and Queen Louise, and probably there will be a garden party at Windsor Castle. It is expected that Princess Thyra and Prince Harold of Denmark will accompany their parents to England.

The Prince of Wales stayed at Kent House, the residence of Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, near East Cowes, during his visit to the Isle of Wight last week, and the Royal yacht Alberta was placed at the disposal of H.R.H. On Thursday the Prince of Wales called on Lord and Lady Suffield, who are staying for some time at Barton Manor, the Royal residence in Osborne Park, which has been lent to them by the King.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are to leave town for Windsor on Saturday, the 18th, and they will stay at Frogmore Lodge for about ten days. The Prince and Princess will be again in residence at Frogmore from Saturday, June 15, until Monday, the 24th, when they are to entertain a small party for Ascot races.

Lord Aberdeen returned from England, at the end of last week, in time for the state opening of the Dublin Exhibition. Lady Aberdeen has recovered from her severe attack of rheumatism, and will probably soon go for a cure and change of air from the Phœnix Park.

The Irish International Exhibition, which was opened with much pomp and circumstance in Dublin last week, bids fair to prove a great success. The ways which lead to success in Ireland are always hard ways, beset with difficulties, both home grown and otherwise. The Irish are perhaps least versed of all people in the art—or craft—of agreeing to differ. It is the defect of their admirable quality of enthusiasm in whatever cause they espouse. However, all is well that ends well; the Irish International Exhibition is national enough as well to suit all views and tastes. The enthusiasm shown at its opening on Saturday was spontaneous and well deserved. The Exhibition has the rare advantage of standing in a park, within view of the mountains, from which fresh breezes rarely fail to blow. No doubt it will contribute to the gaiety of nations, and especially of the nation which, according to so many critics of late years, needs the stimulating effect of gaiety.

The visit of a portion of the Channel Fleet to Kingstown, under the command of Rear-Admiral Sir Reginald Custance, took place under very adverse circumstances as regards weather. A gale blew for several days, and as the "roads" at Kingstown are very open, the public were not able to visit his Majesty's ships as usual, which caused much disappointment.

TO THE SOUTH AFRICANS.—A WELCOME.

O welcome to our fields of play,
Ye cricketers from far S.A.!
Who spoke of "flanneled fools"?
'Tis they who, from whatever land,
Unite to form that Empire grand
Where old King Willow rules.

So mock their pastime as you please,
In high-falutin' Kiplingese;
Your jeerings idle fall.
The "brotherhood of man" 's outclassed;
No brotherhood cements so fast
As that of bat and ball.

Professor Ingram, like many a learned and cultured man, led a retired and quiet life. His home was in Dublin, where he had many friends. He was possessed of much personal charm and geniality, as well as of great erudition. Rightly or wrongly, it was believed in Dublin that he would have filled the Provostship of Trinity College, but for the poetic indiscretion of his youth, the renowned, "Who fears to speak of '98?" Trinity College has produced more than one patriotic poet, but practical patriotism has never yet been in fashion there.

Sir Alexander Wilson, who died last week, was one of the most prominent commercial men in Sheffield, where he had resided for nearly half a century. After he left Edinburgh University, in 1857, he went to New York as representative in the United States of the well-known firm of Charles Cammell and Co., but two years later he returned to England and settled at Sheffield, the headquarters of the business of the Cyclops Works, which was converted into a limited liability company in 1864. The concern has for many years employed over 10,000 hands, armour plates having always been a leading feature of its output. Sir Alexander invented the Wilson compound armour plate of iron and steel, but the firm has since produced a plate made entirely of steel 18in. thick, whereas the original plates rolled at the Cyclops Works early in the sixties were only $4\frac{1}{2}$ in. thick. Sir Alexander Wilson was twice Master Cutler of Sheffield, and during his second term of office Queen Victoria visited the town and conferred a baronetcy on him. He was a staunch Tory of the uncompromising Scotch type, but took no active part in politics. He was a keen sportsman, and was widely known for his love of golf long before that game became fashionable. He was an excellent shot and a remarkably expert angler.

Lord de Ros, who died suddenly in Ireland last week, served for many years in the 1st Life Guards, and he rose from cornet to colonel commanding the regiment, of which he was appointed Colonel-in-Chief in 1902, replacing the late Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar. Lord de Ros was a persona grata at Court during the last reign, and he was for eight years Equerry-in-Ordinary to Prince Albert, and afterwards Equerry-in-Ordinary to Queen Victoria, and finally a Lord-in-Waiting under Lord Beaconsfield and in Lord Salisbury's first two Governments. In 1859 Lord (then Lieutenant-Colonel) de Ros went to Berlin with the late Lord Raglan to represent the Queen and Prince Albert at the christening of the Emperor William. He was an able and a very popular officer, an excellent landlord, and a general favourite in society.

The late peer's mother was a daughter of the fourth Duke of Richmond, who died comparatively young when Governor-General of Canada. The late Lady de Ros lived to celebrate her ninety-sixth birthday, and died in 1891. She was engaged in a controversy towards the close of her life with the late Sir William Fraser concerning the scene of the ball given at Brussels by her mother, the Duchess of Richmond, on the night before the Waterloo campaign opened.

Lord de Ros was Premier Baron of England, his peerage dating from 1264, and he did homage for his rank at the Coronation in 1902. His title to be Premier Baron has been disputed by Lord Mowbray, on the ground that the writ of summons of Henry III., under which Lord de Ros sat in the House of Lords did not create a peerage. The death of Lord de Ros creates a vacancy in the Order of St. Patrick, and this will be the first blue ribbon which has fallen to the gift of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. Lord de Ros was decorated by Mr. Balfour in 1903, and he received the second class of the Royal Victorian Order from Queen Victoria when her Diamond Jubilee was celebrated in 1897. His death vacates the colonelcy of the 1st Life Guards, to which the office of Gold Stick is annexed, which involves four months of annual waiting, but except during the London season the duty is usually on paper only.

The annual London meeting of the members of the R.Y.S. is to be held on Saturday, when the arrangements for Cowes Regatta will be discussed and completed, and there is to be a ballot, as there are several candidates for election. The regatta is to commence on Tuesday, August 6, which is the date of the annual house dinner of the club at the Castle, West Cowes. The Emperor William will be present at this dinner if he comes to Cowes, as is expected, and in any case the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Connaught will attend it. It is probable that the King and Queen will spend ten days in the Solent on board the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, arriving on the evening of Friday, August 2, and leaving on the morning of Monday, the 12th.

The fuss that has been made over the "Mikado" seems rather absurd. Foreign potentates have been represented upon the stage in a ridiculous light often enough without any susceptibilities having been wounded; and the Japanese Government must be morbidly sensitive if it took offence at Mr. Gilbert's fooling. To do it justice, no reason appears to exist for supposing that it is likely to have any such feeling, and, that being so, the Lord Chamberlain would have done better to leave the matter for public opinion to decide. It seems a national misfortune that the Japanese alliance should prevent this generation hearing again the best of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas. Cannot Mr. Gilbert get over the difficulty by changing the venue of the action to some fabulous realm where there are no politics?

I have had rather an alarming letter from Lord Crawford in reference to the remarks in last week's Truth on the design for the rebuilding of the Quadrant. Referring to the sacrifice of stability in contemporary shop architecture by the carrying of the whole superstructure on steel columns, his Lordship observes:—

> There are many corner houses, the whole of the upper portion of which is borne by one or two slight columns at the angle. Were one of these to break suddenly—say, by a motor 'bus charging into the window—the result would be lamentable. There is another eventuality which ought not to be overlooked. The crust of the earth seems to be at present in an unstable condition, and we learn from the papers of constant shocks of earthquake. The present form of construction is not calculated to resist transverse strain, and should London be visited by as serious a shock as occurred in the Eastern Counties a few years ago, the ruin and loss of life would be appalling. Any wave of motion at right angles to the frontage of the shops would send a whole street of houses toppling into the road.

Earthquakes are a capricious form of visitation which it is difficult to be on your guard against. Unless you adopt Japanese architectural methods, it seems to me the only thing to do is to insure, and there is not much safety even that way, for if London were visited by a serious earthquake a good many insurance offices would probably come down with the other establishments. The skidding motor-bus is a more immediate danger and more easily guarded against. I would suggest that the danger spots in all big plate-glass structures should be guarded by stout buffers.

AN ECHO OF THE ONE THOUSAND GUINEAS.

Witch-Elm, ash-uredly, 'tis plane
(Yew'll p'raps forgive my jokes),
A poplar victory wood gain
If fir-st home in the Oaks.

An Anglo-Indian forwards the following postcard, received by his wife at Cawnpore, whose name and address had been evidently obtained from a newspaper announcement of a family nature:—

> Have you read this risqué but exquisite romance from the secret lives of two well-known people? —— —— has treated their peculiar infatuation with consummate art and delicacy. We are "en auto" for Biarritz. Hope you are well. Love from M.

On the other side of the postcard—which was posted in France—is the portrait of the lady novelist and an advertisement of her book, which is published in London. No doubt many other ladies, and men too, have been favoured with similar postcard puffs of the risqué but exquisite romance. It is a very stale and transparent trick.

The principal of an educational institution in Ireland lately asked me for information respecting a concern called the "Literary and Artistic Development Society," of 46, Guilford-street, W.C. Circulars advertising the advantages of this society have been addressed to pupils of the Irish institution, and the principal observed that he finds it very necessary to protect his pupils against people who run mysterious organisations in London. I can easily believe it. In this case the "Society" proclaims that its objects are:—

> The organisation of the rising literary and artistic talent of the United Kingdom with a view to stimulating, encouraging, and developing it, and the production and publication of work of a high standard of excellence.

This is to be accomplished (1) by paying a subscription of 2s. per annum; (2) by competing for prizes for stories, verses, and black and white sketches, and paying in this connection an entrance fee of 1s. or 1s. 6d. Obviously, if he can rope in a few hundred flats as members, this will afford, if not exactly a competency, a pleasant addition to whatever income the promoter may possess from other sources. No less obviously it can serve no other purpose whatever. The business is apparently run by an individual who lodges at the address given in Guilford-street.

The list of sufferers by the newspaper business of Mrs. Davis, alias "Walker," continues to grow. During the past week I have heard from many more, and in two of these cases the announcement of Mrs. Davis's death has been used as an excuse for stopping delivery of the papers without returning the money paid. To heighten the illusion, the bereaved husband seems to have employed deep mourning stationery in notifying the sad event to the customers of the firm. The lady apparently died at Bidford, but I have not heard that any funeral has yet taken place. Several of the victims express a desire to use their legal remedies, and I can only hope that steps in that direction may be taken.

In this connection I hear from Colonel G. Forestier Walker, of Amesbury, that for several years past a pair of adventurers have been personating him and his wife, and also his brother, Major E. Forestier Walker, and his wife. "When my brother is abroad," says Colonel Forestier Walker, "he personates him, and when I was abroad he so honoured me." The pair have used stationery stamped with the Royal Artillery crest, and appear to have been living mostly in furnished houses taken on short tenancies. Whether they are identical with Mr. Staniland Davis and his wife I have no means of knowing, but the circumstances above mentioned, and the fact of Mrs. Davis having used the name of Forestier Walker, as well as the motto of that family, together with the other circumstances above mentioned, rather point to that conclusion. At any rate, I should think it unlikely, after what has now happened, that Colonel Forestier Walker and his family will be further troubled by this annoyance.

A great deal of stupid, ignorant nonsense has appeared in certain journals on the subject of what they describe as "the King's snub to the Royal Academy." It has always been the rule for a list of the works relating to members of the Royal family to be sent to the Sovereign by the council, with a cross against those which have been rejected by the Hanging Committee, and the commands of the Sovereign thereon are asked for. Works have constantly been included or excluded by command, particularly during the period when Prince Albert was practically the supreme authority. On the present occasion Mr. Dressler's bust of the Queen of Spain had been rejected, and when the usual list of Royal subjects was sent to the King he expressed a wish that it should be exhibited at Burlington House. The attempt to get up a sensation on the subject is idiotic.

AN OLD RHYME ADAPTED FOR A NEW TIME.

"Where are you coming from, down-to-date maid?"
"I'm coming from Burlington House," she said.
"What were you doing there, down-to-date maid?"
"Doing the Academy, sir," she said.
"How did you do it, down-to-date maid?"
"I sized up the womenfolk's frocks," she said.
"What else attracted you, down-to-date maid?"
"Algie and tea and flirtation," she said.
"And what of the pictures, down-to-date maid?"
"Oh, I couldn't be bothered with pictures," she said.

In reference to the question of the Whaplode tithes I have received a lengthy letter from the Vicar of Whaplode, in answer to what was said in last week's Truth on that part of his case which specially relates to the Uppingham School endowment. Owing, however, to pressure of other matters, I regret that I am compelled to hold the letter over till next week.

The Simeon Trustees have presented the Rev. Francis L'Estrange Fawcett, who has been for eleven years Vicar of St. Mary's, Bury St. Edmund's, to the rectory of Cheltenham, which is one of the most important livings in their gift, and of the net value of nearly £600 a year, with house. The vacancy at Cheltenham has been caused by the preferment of Canon Roxby to the rectory of Tiverton, which is said to be now the most valuable benefice in Devonshire, on the presentation of Lord Harrowby.

The following passages in the proceedings of the Lower House of Convocation last week present a curious conflict of ideas:—

1. Recommendation of Joint Committee on the Moral Witness of the Church.—That more attention should be given in the public teaching of the Church to the exposition of the duty of the Christian to his neighbour. . . . .

2. Gravamen presented by the Archdeacon of Oxford with reference to the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, and adopted by the House.—That . . . nothing contained in the Act (if the Bill should become law) shall relieve the clergy from obedience to the law of the Church now prevailing, or shall subject a clergyman to penalties for refusing the privileges of Church membership to persons who have contracted these unions.

Apropos of my paragraph last week, the Rev. J. H. Cartwright of Carlisle writes that he did not object to the Rector of Wetheral giving oranges and Easter eggs to his Sunday school children. His objection was that "by giving the invitation to attend at the rectory for these presents in the Council day school the Rector turned a praiseworthy act into an occasion for emphasising sectarian differences even among little children." It appears that emphasis was placed upon the point that only Church of England children were invited, and as the invitation had already been given to them in the Sunday school, there was, as my correspondent observes, the less need for it to be repeated in the day school. Mr. Cartwright seems to think that I made a charge of lack of charity against him, but that was not intended. In the circumstances, the Rector's conduct was certainly open to censure, and Mr. Cartwright's protest against it fully justified.

It might be worth the consideration of the President of the Local Government Board whether it is desirable that a medical officer of health should receive a capitation fee on admissions to an infectious diseases hospital in his district. Obviously, cases may arise where this arrangement creates a conflict between the interests of the medical officer and those of the public. Here is an example of what I mean. An outbreak of infectious disease, including scarlet fever and diphtheria, occurs in a country school. The managers think that the school should be closed. The medical officer of health thinks not. The school is kept open till the next holidays, by which time eighteen cases of scarlet fever and three of diphtheria have occurred. No one suggests that a medical officer in such a case would not exercise his judgment honestly. But the point is that the judgment of the most honest and scrupulous of mankind may be unconsciously influenced by his private interests or prepossessions. We are all equally liable to this; and if you put a public official in a position where his decision one way or the other may affect him financially, it is only natural to expect that where the pros and cons are pretty evenly balanced the benefit of the doubt will be given rather on the side of the private than the public interest.

The account given in Truth of the 24th ult. of the begging operations of Mrs. Hanham, of Graveney, sufficiently indicated that this lady possesses plenty of assurance. The same thing is shown by a letter which she has written to me, in which she asserts that every statement in the correspondence that I have published is true, and that she has never swindled anybody in her life. As the correspondence spoke for itself clearly enough, and is merely one specimen of a course of conduct extending over many years, it seems unnecessary to discuss the issue which she thus raises. She incidentally denies, however, that her husband's licence has been withdrawn, and as I may have been misinformed on this point, and I have no desire to reflect upon the Vicar of Graveney, I am quite willing to accept her statement on that point. It has no bearing on the question of her own proceedings, and I only mentioned the Vicar's circumstances in order to explain how a lady is able to boast that she is the wife of a beneficed clergyman and at the same time carry on the trade of a begging-letter writer.

In contrast to the Metropolitan and Provincial Association, and other insignificant charities of the same class, a correspondent sends me from Carlisle the report of a fund for giving poor children an outing at the seaside which has been in operation in that city for the last thirteen years. This little fund obtained in subscriptions last year £76 odd. It spent some £67 in taking children to Silloth, and another £2 6s. 6d. in printing and stationery, carrying forward the balance to the current year. No less than 1,656 children had a day by the sea for this expenditure. Compare this result, and the £2 6s. 6d. spent on printing and stationery, with the expenditure of £426 of the Metropolitan and Provincial Association in order to dispense benefits of about the same value, and you see the difference between two classes of public charities—the one class in which the charity is worth practically 100 per cent. of the income, and the other class in which it is worth about fifty per cent.; the remaining fifty per cent. being consumed by officials, collectors, and working expenses.

A REASONABLE INFERENCE.

And so when the collector axes,
The ladies will not pay their taxes,
  Until a vote they gain.
At least, that's what, with angry snarlings,
They threaten, these ferocious darlings,,
  Who've suffrage on the brain.

Yet since—a little bird has told me—
(If wrong, responsible don't hold me)
  A woman's "Nay" means "Yea,"
'Twould seem their strenuous negation
Is but the strongest affirmation
  That they, in fact, will pay.

Apropos of the old-age pensions question, my attention has been called to the work done by a very flourishing little organisation called the Silver Trade Pension Society. The society does not profess to be on a self-supporting basis. It receives £400 a year from the Goldsmiths' Company, and a good many annual subscriptions from firms in the trade, as well as occasional legacies; and it has an income of £435 from investments which it has accumulated in the course of some seventy years. But it is now paying to members and their female relatives £1,173 a year in pensions, besides disbursing another £20 in gratuities, and it had a balance of £362 in hand at the end of last year. It is therefore in a very strong financial position. The treasurer and hon. secretary are members of firms in the trade, but the cases are considered and the pensions assigned by a committee of workmen, who look after the general administration of the fund. The secretary receives 30s. a week, and the total managerial expenses come to about £117 per annum.

Now what this society does is to grant to a member, when he becomes eligible for pension, and when his case has been passed, or to the member's widow, an annual pension of from 12s. to 15s. a week, supplemented by an annual sum equivalent to half the amount of his total contributions to the fund. For example, a man may have subscribed one guinea a year for ten years—the majority of members, I understand, subscribe at least as much as this. He will receive in due course a pension of at least 12s. per week, plus £5 5s. a year. If he had subscribed for twenty years he would receive £10 10s. a year in addition to his weekly allowance, and so on. A man may become eligible at fifty-five, but his claim will be considered on its merits; and, of course, in a trade where men earn good wages there is no inducement to a man to give up work before he is compelled when he can invest small savings with such enormous future advantage to himself.

It will be seen at a glance that there is no pretence here that the assessment of pensions is on any actuarial basis. The scale adopted has only been arrived at by experience of what the fund will stand, and the accounts show that it works quite satisfactorily on this basis from a financial point of view. The society is really a benevolent one; but the point that deserves notice is that with a certain amount of benevolent assistance, coupled with prudent management, it should be possible to secure to workmen and their widows such a handsome provision for old age. The contention of the gentleman who called my attention to the fund is that there is no reason why the same thing should not be done in any trade. As regards that, it must be remembered that the Goldsmiths' Company's annual subscription of £400 a year is an essential item in the solvency of the fund, and that few trades can obtain benevolent assistance of such magnitude from one single source. But the position of this society certainly shows that a great deal may be done by well-directed voluntary effort, and it is a useful example of what the State, with its larger resources, might effect towards encouraging thrift.

May I commend to the notice of my neighbours in Westminster the appeal for funds which is being made on behalf of the Westminster Ladies' Association for the Care of Friendless Girls? Every one acquainted with Westminster must be aware of the need there is for this association, which is carried on in connection with the London Diocesan Council for Preventive and Rescue Work. The Dean of Westminster is the president, and the hon. treasurer is Sir J. W. Buchanan Riddell, Bart., St. Paul's Chapter House, E.C.

A gallant officer who is a member of the National Service League asks my permission to "say a few words" in answer to recent observations in Truth on the propaganda of the League. Although the few words would fill the best part of a column, I would make an effort to oblige if any of them answered the arguments I have used, but they really make no attempt to. They merely state over again the case for compulsory service, which everybody knows, and which many of us consider is not made out. Here are a few extracts which will sufficiently show this:—

It is only after bitter experience, especially brought to light by the late South African War, that Lord Roberts, and all thinking soldiers who have deeply and earnestly considered the matter, have been forced to the conclusion that we can no longer depend upon the voluntary system for the men we require in a national emergency. . . . .

If men in sufficient numbers would come forward of their own accord to undergo a certain amount of military training, not longer than in the Swiss Army, no one would want compulsion. But they do not come forward. . . . .

Of course, no one proposes compulsory service for our Regular Army, which has to serve abroad and garrison our over-sea possessions. But Mr. Haldane is trying to fill the ranks of the other branch, the Auxiliary or Territorial Army, by volunteers. Well, we shall see whether or not it is to be done. . . . .

The great need in addition to being able to shoot and knowing enough drill to be moved about in companies and battalions without confusion, is expressed in that magic word, "discipline," without which an army is no more than a crowd; and the habit of discipline is only to be acquired by men acting together in large numbers under authority for some considerable time. It will be found very difficult—most likely impossible—to get young men in sufficient numbers to subject themselves to the necessary discipline to make them of any use without some measure of compulsory service. . . . . .

The arguments which I used in my recent article on the National Service League manifesto were these: (1) That to give to every man in the country a period of training on the Swiss model, and to maintain an organisation under which they will form an efficient army during the period of their liability for service, will cost at least 25 millions a year; (2) that if this expenditure is to be incurred on a home defence army it will inevitably involve a corresponding reduction of expenditure on the Navy and the Regular Army; (3) that all experience tells us that though compulsory training might be enacted by Parliament, the really efficient army would never be created. The conclusion is, that in the attempt to create two lines of defence—a thing no country has ever yet attempted—we should simply destroy the one which has always served its purpose, and, getting nothing equally efficient in its place, end by falling between two stools.

It will be seen in a moment, from the quotations given above, that the spokesman of the National Service League makes no attempt to answer these arguments. And what he does say is disputable at every point. The Boer war certainly showed that if we require a trained and organised army of two or three hundred thousand men at a moment's notice for service in some country abroad outside India, we do not possess it; but we did not need the Boer war to tell us that; and the "national emergency" under which such an army would be required can only be an emergency of our own creation. Moreover, the proposals of the National Service League do not promise to provide such an army. It is not true that "all thinking soldiers who have deeply and earnestly considered the matter" agree with Lord Roberts and his league; and we have been told the precise opposite by Mr. Balfour and by Mr. Haldane in the name of the Committee of Defence and the Army Council. There is ample military authority for holding that every contingency which we have any justification for anticipating will be sufficiently prepared for if we can mobilise an efficient army of 150,000 for foreign service, and possess visible means of reinforcing it for six months ahead; and if we possess behind our Navy a fairly well-trained domestic army of the numerical strength of the existing auxiliary forces.

On that view of the matter the only practical question remaining for solution is whether a number of men equivalent to that of the old auxiliary forces can be enlisted under the stricter terms of service which Mr. Haldane's Bill contemplates. The National Service enthusiasts may assert that voluntary enlistment will not stand the strain, but no prophecy of this kind is of any value. As my correspondent says, "We shall see." But if we see 250,000 men enrolled in a home-service army, fairly well trained, and properly officered and equipped, we shall see all we need to see. And I, for one, should be uncommonly sorry to see more, for anything beyond the minimum necessary for safety will involve danger to the maintenance of our naval supremacy, and an addition to burdens which are already too heavy for the nation to bear comfortably in time of peace.

In consequence of discharges of men over twenty-one years' service, there has lately been an acceleration of promotion in certain artillery units. The question has thus been raised whether a man who has been for several years recommended for promotion ought not to have the preference over men only now put forward, although they may be senior to him. For example, I happen to know of a battery, R.H.A., in which a sergeant was recommended for promotion to staff rank six years ago, and has done the work of a staff-sergeant off and on during that time. Senior men are now being recommended, and are apparently likely to be promoted before him. As a matter of principle, this seems altogether wrong. For a long time past it has been a grievance that recommendation for promotion has led to no practical result, and when an opportunity arises of redressing the grievance, surely the men who have been suffering under it should be attended to first.

A few weeks back I published a letter from a correspondent in South Africa, who complained that N.C.O.s in certain corps serving abroad have lost the opportunity of re-engaging as required by the terms of the proficiency pay order, owing to the necessity of sending their re-engagements home for ratification. I had a difficulty at that time in believing that arrangements had not been made to get over this difficulty, but I now learn from South Africa that the result complained of has come to pass in several instances with the grossest injustice to the men concerned. There are at least three cases of men in the Army Service Corps who have lost their service pay for this reason, without getting any equivalent; and it is possible that many other men have suffered in the same way either in South Africa or other stations abroad. This is really a matter which ought to receive attention at the War Office.

To show exactly the sort of thing that has happened, here is one specific case of which I have particulars. Early in August a staff-sergeant re-engaged to complete twenty-one years, signing the usual form, and passing the medical examination. Had the man been serving in England his re-engagement would, in the ordinary course of things, have been approved in the course of a week. This would have been more than a month before the issue of the proficiency pay order, and two months before anything on the subject was known in South Africa. But owing to the necessity of transmitting the re-engagement form to the Record Office in England, the man's re-engagement was not notified in the regimental orders until October 4, and as it only took effect from that date, the man forfeits his service pay of 7d. a day for the rest of his time. Obviously, his re-engagement has been obtained under false pretences. When this difficulty was first referred to in Truth at the end of last year, I was informed on good authority that arrangements had been made by which it would be obviated; but the fact remains that the man just referred to has made representations on the subject through his commanding officer, and the official reply is to the effect that previous decisions on this subject must stand. Whatever may have been intended, therefore, at Headquarters, effect has certainly not been given to it locally, and the whole result is altogether scandalous.

Apropos of a question asked in Truth a few weeks ago as to the propriety of relieving a sergeant of all military duty in order that he may be employed as a canteen waiter, an Indian correspondent writes to point out that it is the regular practice in India to allow Army men of all ranks to accept paid employment which takes them away from military duty. The instances he gives relate to employment outside the Army, which is a somewhat different matter; and none of them seems to be incompatible with military duty, which was the ground of objection to the sergeant's employment as canteen waiter. One of the cases mentioned is that of an officer who is allowed to manage a club, where he receives board and lodging; but it does not appear that he is at the same time relieved of military duty. Another example is that of men holding appointments as clerks at race meetings; but this again only means withdrawal from military duty for a few days per annum.

The same remark applies to the case of officers and men employed to manage the totalisators at race meetings. There is a valid objection to this practice, but it arises from the fact that such employment has occasionally involved disastrous results to the employed. Whether military men should or should not be allowed to earn pay or perquisites from civilian jobs, which are not inconsistent with the due performance of their military duties, is a question for the Government, and must be determined very much by local conditions. Local conditions in India are not the same as in England, and this no doubt explains why Army men are allowed to do things there which would cause a violent outcry here.

The document printed below speaks for itself. The bandsman referred to in it is a native soldier studying at Kneller Hall, who was proposing to purchase a watch from Masters, Ltd., on the instalment system. Although the document is typewritten, the fact of its being sent for the signature of the pay-sergeant and the customer indicates that the proposed course of business is an ordinary one, and the matter deserves attention at Headquarters. There ought to be definite regulations forbidding pay-sergeants to co-operate with firms of the Masters type in getting soldiers into debt, and the War Office would do well to ascertain how far N.C.O.s are at present acting as debt collectors for such people, and what they get for it:—

I consent to the sum of 5s. being deducted and forwarded monthly as above.

In connection with the recent granting of pensions to temporary civil assistants of the Ordnance Survey, a late employee belonging to this class calls attention to his hard case. Owing to the reduction of the staff he was discharged last year after thirty-three years' service as a so-called "temporary" civil assistant. If he had been kept on till the end of November he would have been entitled, under the new scheme, to a pension. As it was his discharge took place on August 31, with the result that instead of a pension for life he received only a trumpery gratuity of £66. This is undoubtedly a very hard case indeed, but, unfortunately, hard cases are almost certain to occur wherever any scheme affecting pay or pensions in the public service comes into operation, and I am afraid that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the Treasury to know where to draw the line if they once began to make exceptions to the rules that must be laid down.

A remarkable plea of impecuniosity—remarkable, at least, in the case of a Government Department—has been put forward by the Local Government Board in connection with some recent litigation concerning the making of some new streets at Portsmouth. The owners of a building estate there considered that the requirements of the municipal authority as to the new street levels were unreasonable, and held that the Portsmouth Corporation Act of 1883 gave him a right of appeal to the Local Government Board. That body denied that it had any jurisdiction, and opposed the application which the property owner made to a Divisional Court for a mandamus. The Divisional Court decided that the Board was not bound to hear the appeal. The property owner then carried the matter to the Court of Appeal, which reversed the previous decision, and made an order upon the Board to hear and determine the appeal in question, costs being awarded to the appellant.

In this situation the Local Government Board, it is reported, has now called upon the Portsmouth Corporation to pay its legal expenses, on the ground that it has no funds for the purpose! The Corporation is hardly likely to pay the Board's law costs. Why indeed should it be expected to do so? Unless, therefore, the Board finds the money—I dare say that can be managed somehow—we may see an execution levied in Whitehall, or possibly the committal to prison of Mr. John Burns for the debts of his hard-up Department.

Extraordinary scenes took place at Exeter last week on a sale of goods seized in execution for income-tax at the house of Mr. Harry Hems, the head of a well-known and old-established firm in Exeter, and one of the most highly respected citizens of the place. From a statement of the facts furnished to me by Mr. Hems himself, it seems that he refused payment, and submitted to the incalculable annoyance and indignity of a seizure and sale of his effects, on public grounds and as a protest against an arbitrary assessment by the local surveyor. He had had his return for income-tax prepared by a well-known accountant of Exeter, himself a Justice of the Peace, paying a fee of ten guineas for this purpose. The surveyor, as these gentry occasionally do, refused to accept the return, and made what he conceived to be a higher assessment, on which the tax was demanded, which Mr. Hems refused to pay.

Mr. Hems does not state why he did not appeal against the official assessment, as I presume he had the right to do. But if he objected to the procedure of going before the local Commissioners of Taxes, especially when forced upon him by the arbitrary action of the surveyor, he would only be on common ground with many thousands of aggrieved income-tax payers engaged in business. It is to be hoped that the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be directed to the protest which he has made, and to the public scandal created when a citizen who has discharged all his obligations faithfully all his life, and is highly respected by his neighbours, feels himself impelled, at an advanced age and while ill in bed, to defy the Inland Revenue authorities and suffer the fate of a "passive resister." If the income-tax in its new shape is to be a permanent feature of our fiscal machinery, Mr. Asquith ought to seriously undertake the improvement of the present system of assessment.

In the case of men in trade more particularly, the present system of appeal to commissioners is more distasteful than submission to an arbitrary and excessive official assessment. Instances of this have been given in these columns again and again. Such a state of things is a public danger, for it places every tradesman at the mercy of the surveyor of taxes. I believe the majority of those officials to be thoroughly fair and considerate, and I have never had any difficulty with any of them myself. But there are bound to be exceptions. Cases naturally arise here and there where a pushful and enterprising surveyor, with an eye to his own advancement, proceeds to put the screw on all round, in order to increase his returns. Against such a man there is at present no protection worth the name, and the only way of providing it, if the power of rejecting the taxpayer's return and making an official assessment is to be retained, is to give a right of appeal to some authority unconnected with the Revenue service, and a right which can be used without reluctance, and without the necessity of the appellant disclosing all his business affairs to neighbours, and possibly to creditors or trade competitors.

A disgraceful story of the treatment of a dying old woman of eighty was related at an inquest at Poplar last week. The parish doctor ordered her removal to the Poor Law infirmary. Both the driver and the attendant of the ambulance which fetched her were drunk, and when carrying her from the house they dropped the poor old creature on the pavement, while when they arrived at the infirmary they could not open the ambulance door for twenty minutes because they had mislaid the key. It was stated by the Clerk to the Guardians that the salaries of both men had been reduced and that they had promised to sign the pledge; but this seems to be a very inadequate method of dealing with such gross misconduct. Such men clearly ought not to be left in charge of an ambulance.

Recently a correspondent drew the attention of the Postmaster-General to the extremely objectionable character of a circular which he had received through the post in an open cover from a man named John Mellinger, of Palmer's-road, New Southgate. The secretary to the Post Office replied:—

> I am directed to inform you that Mellinger was prosecuted by the Postmaster-General in January, 1906, for sending similar circulars by post in open covers, but at the subsequent Middlesex Quarter Sessions the [Grand] Jury threw out the Bill.
> The Postmaster-General regrets the annoyance occasioned to you, but in the circumstances he fears that no further action can be taken in the matter.

The Post Office has so often been criticised—I have been one of the critics myself—on account of its seeming indifference to the mis-use of the postal service by such pests as Mellinger, that it is only fair that the fullest credit should be given to the Department for its action in this case. The sufferers from the annoyance will know now that the parties to blame are not the authorities at St. Martin's-le-Grand, but the Middlesex Grand Jury, who thus stamped with their approval the employment of the post for the distribution of literary garbage. This Grand Jury must have been a nasty-minded lot. I can scarcely believe that a second jury would be found ready to endorse their decision, and if there is no legal obstacle in the way, I trust that the Postmaster-General will institute a further prosecution.

Apropos of a bankruptcy case noticed the other day, a correspondent calls my attention to some figures which he has taken out of the official report of the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy, showing the different results obtained in the administration of bankrupt estates by private trustees and by official receivers. The figures are worked out in the report for eighteen classes of cases, graduated according to the value of the gross assets. I give below a few instances in which the contrast between the cost of administration by private trustees and official receivers is most striking. The first column gives the amount of the gross assets, the second the percentage of costs to assets in cases administered by trustees, and the third the same percentage in the case of official receivers: —

Assets.	Costs (Trustees).	Costs (Official Receivers).
£50— 100 ...	90.13 ...	42.39
£200— 250 ...	52.79 ...	28.47
£400— 500 ...	37.47 ...	21.89
£900—1,000 ...	33.09 ...	20.85
£2,000—3,000 ...	24.46 ...	15.31

The mean average percentage of costs in all cases is: for trustees, 41.18; for official receivers, 22.12.

It will be seen that these figures bear out what I have always contended—namely, that an official system of administration can be made very much cheaper than administration by a trustee. At the same time, I am quite certain that the official administration might be very materially cheapened. There is, of course, an inevitable minimum of expenditure which cannot be reduced. I should be sorry to have to administer an estate worth £100 for an expenditure of less than £30 or £40; but as the value of the assets rises beyond that point, a very small percentage on the first irreducible minimum of expenditure ought to cover all costs, unless in cases involving litigation or other exceptional difficulties. Where it is a case of a tradesman with an estate worth a few hundred pounds, and nothing to do but sell his stock, get in his book debts, and distribute the proceeds, I would undertake to do the whole job, taking one case with another, for a commission of 20 per cent. on the assets realised, and to get a comfortable profit for myself out of it. Nor do I think it would be difficult to devise an official system under which the same result could be arrived at.

Pending any reform in that direction, it is well worth the while of creditors generally to look at the evidence given above as to the comparative cost of administration by trustees and official receivers, for it rests with them to decide which procedure is to be adopted. The gentleman who sends me the above figures reckons, after applying the above percentage to the whole quantity of assets administered during the year to which the report relates, that creditors lost in the aggregate nearly a quarter of a million of money by employing private trustees in place of official receivers. That is a fact worth bearing in mind when complaint is made of the wastefulness of the present system. The appointment of a trustee is frequently due to wire-pulling, mostly by solicitors concerned in the case; but it is really the fault of creditors if such manœuvres are successful. My correspondent seems to suggest that some amendment of the law is necessary in the way of "removing the restrictions which in large cases usually fetter the creditors in the choice of a trustee." I do not quite appreciate the point of this suggestion; but I have no doubt he is right in the further observation he makes that creditors are much to blame for not attending meetings and looking after their interests personally, instead of leaving matters to be settled by special proxies, which in nineteen case out of twenty have been "solicited."

It is only fair to add, however, that there are trustees and trustees. I feel bound to add this in view of a circular that has reached me, having been issued last week by Messrs. Oscar Berry and Co., of Monument-square, E.C., to the creditors of an estate which they have been administering. The creditors have already received dividends of 17s. 6d. in the pound, and in paying a final dividend, making up the full 20s., Mr. Oscar Berry calls attention to the valuable assistance he has received from the debtor during the three years that it has taken to accomplish this result, and suggests that the creditors should show their appreciation by making a rebate on the amount of their debts. Let us hope they will. If they look at the above evidence of the too common results obtained by creditors, they will feel grateful to the "inspector"—this is not a case of trusteeship in bankruptcy—as well as the debtor.

In the newspaper reports of a case heard in the Wandsworth County Court last week the defendant, Frank Burton, is described—and seemingly he so described himself in the witness box—as a "licensed moneylender and auctioneer," of 1, Greyhound-lane, Streatham. This is a mis-description which it may be as well to correct. Moneylenders are not licensed but registered, which is not by any means the same thing. If Burton were licensed it would obviously be the duty of the authorities at Somerset House to withdraw his licence, in view of the revelations of his methods of business which were given in this case. He was mulcted in £20 damages for an illegal seizure of furniture under a bill of sale, which was void by reason of the fact that the consideration, though stated as £30, was really only £20, the borrower having had to hand back £10 the moment the document was signed. This trick for getting round the Bills of Sale Act—which requires that the actual consideration shall not be less than £30—is not at all uncommon, and it cannot be too widely known that it renders the document absolutely invalid.

A rather foolish liberality was displayed by the victim of the usurer trading as "J. Harmsworth" in a case heard by Mr. Justice Channell on Saturday. "J. Harmsworth" is the alias of one Lewis Levene, who has been frequently criticised in these columns on account of his systematic attempts to enmesh railway stationmasters, to whom he addresses a special circular. In the present case the borrower was a licensed victualler at Newbury, who on a loan of £50 was charged exorbitant interest, and treated in a most harsh and oppressive manner. Levene sued for a balance of £43 remaining due to him, and defendant asked that the transaction should be re-opened under the Moneylenders Act. Mr. Justice Channell agreed that it should be re-opened, and on behalf of the defendant it was suggested that the plaintiff should be allowed a sum of £35. His lordship pointed out that "even that figure made the rate of interest nearly 100 per cent.," but as it was offered by the defendant, judgment was accordingly given for the plaintiff, though without costs. The borrower would have been much better advised to leave the rate of interest to be settled by the Judge, who would probably have awarded a good deal less than this.

In another moneylending case before Judge Edge at Clerkenwell County Court last week, Arthur George STAMMERING cured only by personal tuition; interview on written application.—Mr. A. C. SCHNELLE, 119, Bedford Court-mansions, London, W.C. Pupils taken in residence.

Whiteman, alias "Cox and Co.," had charged interest at the rate of 60 per cent. per annum on a small loan amply secured by a bill of sale. His Honour taught this notorious bloodsucker a lesson by cutting down the interest to 10 per cent. I observe that under cross examination Whiteman denied that he had traded in the name of Seymour, saying that he only did so as "Cox and Co." This is a sort of half-truth, the fact being that he is registered in partnership with his brother, Wm. Herbert Whiteman, as "Seymour and Whiteman."

On one day last week three cases were heard in the Liverpool Police-court in which the offences were, directly or indirectly, attributable to the pernicious influence of female moneylenders. In the first a woman, charged with drunkenness, attributed her offence to recklessness at being dunned to pay 10s. a month interest on a loan of £1. In the second a woman was charged with attempted suicide in despair at being unable to pay 8s. 4d. interest weekly on a loan of £5. The third case differed from the others, inasmuch as the borrower appeared in the witness-box to charge the moneylender with assault. In each of these cases the moneylender was a woman. I do not know whether Liverpool is especially infested with harpies of this type, but the foregoing is certainly an astonishing record. The probability is that not one of them is registered, and as the Liverpool police have already shown a keen desire to enforce the Moneylenders Act in these cases, I trust they will give their attention to the parties concerned. As to the rate of interest charged, it is enough to make the mouths of the Samuels and the Levenes and the rest of the registered fraternity absolutely drip with desire.

The prejudice of the County Bench at Lancaster against motorists has frequently been manifested in the infliction of heavy penalties for trumpery offences. Their worships have now taken an opportunity of showing the same prejudice in a case in which two cattle drovers deliberately obstructed the highway to prevent a motor-cyclist from passing. The men were summoned on the information of a policeman, who said that their herd of cattle occupied the whole of the road, and that they refused to make a way for the motorist to pass, one of them, when he was asked by the officer to do so, replying, with an oath, "No fear!" The policeman himself had to get the cattle to the side of the road.

The defendants had aggravated their offence by giving the officer false names and addreses, with the result that he was engaged for two days in tracing them. This alone, in the case of a motorist, would have been deemed an ample reason for coming down upon the offender with the utmost rigour of the law, and I dare say that it would, too, have weighed against the drovers if they had impeded the progress of a magistrate's carriage and pair. As, however, it was a motor-cyclist whom they had obstructed, the Bench let them off with fines of five shillings each, which were immediately paid by a J.P. named Barton. Apparently it was only for the sake of appearances that any fines at all were imposed, Mr. Barton and his colleagues obviously regarding the conduct of these two road hogs with a good deal of sympathy.

At the Central Criminal Court last week, Lionel Jacobsen pleaded guilty to one count of an indictment charging him with a series of robberies perpetrated in the character of a public-house broker, and was sentenced to four months' imprisonment. Some of my readers may remember the name of the prisoner, which has been mentioned in these columns several times during the last twelve years. I find that I first showed him up in October, 1895. At that period he was by way of carrying on business in Marylebone under the name of Jackson as a house agent, or an agent for the sale of businesses. He swindled clients right and left by sticking to the deposits or purchase-money which he received. When sued, he evaded service by the plea of illness or other excuses. When a creditor succeeded in recovering judgment, it was only to find that there was nothing to levy upon, the debtor's establishment being his wife's, or covered by bill of sale, or what not. His name was as well known in the Marylebone County Court as that of the Judge or the Registrar, but for reasons which I never thought sufficient the Judge refused to make a committal order against him.

Since 1895 I have repeatedly heard of Jacobsen in connection with transactions of the class above described, and as a swindler of tradesmen, a dodger of landlords, and a chronic undischarged bankrupt. At his trial last week four cases of larceny were alleged against him, the sums misappropriated ranging from £20 to £80. In these circumstances the trivial sentence imposed upon him really seems deplorable. The Judge, of course, did not know as much about the man as I do; and Jacobsen, under clever legal advice, pleaded guilty to one count, thereby preventing the rest being gone into, and set up by his counsel an ingenious explanation of this transaction, accompanied by a strong certificate from the prison doctor as to the sad state of his health. But a Scotland Yard officer gave the Judge an account of the prisoner's record, which should have shown his lordship the class of man he had to deal with, and if the man's health has not prevented him living by his wits for twelve years, it ought not to relieve him from a term of penal servitude. It was only owing to the fact that in his latest transactions he has put himself at the mercy of a powerful trade protection society that he was brought to justice. As long as he was robbing single individuals he was sure of impunity, and it may be added that a great many of his victims have been women, and frequently poor women. Such a scoundrel, when he is brought to justice, certainly deserves no mercy.

The presence of the most notable case included in my Legal Pillory this week can, I imagine, only be due to some temporary aberration on the part of the learned Stipendiary who dispenses justice at the Pontypridd Police-court. Speaking generally, the magistracy, even the unpaid, are to-day almost unanimously of opinion that cases of gross cruelty to children cannot adequately be punished by a mere pecuniary penalty, and it is therefore a little startling to find a stipendiary magistrate letting off a well-to-do woman who unmercifully beats her three-year-old step-daughter with a paltry fine. A curious example of the leniency which the county magistracy too often show in cases of cruelty to animals is disclosed in the proceedings before the Watton Bench chronicled below. According to these Solons, the hardened ruffian who ventures to play a game of cards on a Sunday afternoon is a greater offender than the man who ties a pig up in a sack, throws it into a ditch, and leaves it to starve.

Pollokshaws Police-court. Before Provost Macdougall. Thomas Bannan, charged with assaulting his wife with a poker. Fined £2.

Wrexham Police-court. George Davis, charged with assaulting Alfred Chatham in a railway train by striking him several blows and knocking him senseless. The attack was unprovoked. Fined £2 and costs.

Watton Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. Hemsworth, Alexander, Frost, Capt. Randolph, Hon. C. B. Hanbury and Buscall. H. Page, charged with cruelty to a pig. He put it into a ditch tied up in a sack and left it for three days. Fined 10s. and 13s. costs.

Boston Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. Thompson, Beaulah and Porter. H. Smith, charged with a savage and unprovoked assault on a man whom he struck with some sharp instrument, cutting his temple open. Fined 20s. and costs.

Doncaster Police-court. H. J. Williams, pig-dealer, charged with cruelty to pigs. He sent eight pigs from Essex to Dodworth in a crate 45in. long, 26in. wide, and 16in. deep, and the pigs were 24in. long and from 9in. to 10in. broad. Fined 20s. and costs.

Skipton Police-court. S. Murray and J. Ireland, charged with assaults on police constables, who were knocked down and kicked. Owing to the increase in assaults on the police, the Bench was asked to deal more severely with the offenders. Murray fined 10s. and costs, Ireland 25s. and costs.

Cardiff Police-court. Before Messrs. J. H. Cory and T. H. Stephens. D. Murray, charged with assaulting the landlady of a public-house and a police constable, who afterwards arrested him. He struck the woman because she refused to serve him, and afterwards stripped to the waist and struck and kicked the constable. Fined 20s. and costs.

Kilmarnock Police-court. W. G. Christie, charged with driving a motor car at a speed beyond ten miles an hour at Seamill. The speed was 18 miles an hour. Fined £7.

Birmingham Police-court. Before Messrs. Smallwood and Harris. A strong looking man, charged with refusing to perform his allotted task at the workhouse. One month's hard labour.

Watton Petty Sessions. Before the same bench. Nine working men, charged with gaming at cards on the highway on Sunday, April 14. Five of the defendants fined £1 10s. 6d. each, and the others, who did not appear, £2 0s. 6d. inclusive.

Reepham Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. Gay, Innes Watson, W. R. Collyer, W. E. Norris, and J. E. Cremer. Robert Fuller, charged with stealing a shirt, value 2s. 6d. One month's hard labour.

Welshpool Police-court. David Evans, charged with night-poaching. He was one of a party of three men who fired five shots and bagged five pheasants. Four months, and in default of finding a surety of £20 five months' hard labour. Also 14 days' for having no gun licence.

Mansfield Borough Police-court. Before Col. L. Coke, and Messrs. Taylor, Bonser, Coupe and Dr. Palmer. Three boys, charged with damaging a wall belonging to the Duke of Bedford. They threw some stones from it into water to make rings. The eldest fined 20s. and costs, the second, 10s. and costs, and the youngest discharged.

Haywards Heath Petty Sessions. Thomas Harris, charged with smashing six panes of glass in a cell window at the Cuckfield Workhouse. Six weeks' hard labour.

Scunthorpe Police-court. Before Messrs. Fletcher, Foster and Cliff. H. Jackson, charged with game trespass on October 25. Fined £2 and costs.

Ilkeston Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. Sudbury, Tatham and Maltby. Robert Booth, charged with cruelty to a calf and stirk by starving them. They were simply skin and bone, and the chairman, after viewing the animals, declared it to be a case of great cruelty. Fined £3 and costs.

Pontypridd Police-court. Before the Stipendiary. Mrs. Roberts, a smartly dressed young woman, charged with cruelty to her stepdaughter, aged 3½. The child was unmercifully beaten. There were eight bruises on the face in addition to a black eye, and the body was one mass of bruises, which were impossible to count. Fined £3.

Cromer Police-court. Before Messrs. E. Denham Spurrell and F. H. Barclay. H. Dickerson, an aged inmate of Beckham Workhouse, charged with refusing to clean the knives. Fourteen days' hard labour.

East Grinstead Police-court. William Smith, charged with sleeping out. Three months' hard labour.

Neath Police-court. Before the Mayor and Messrs. Phillips, Teague and Jones. Thomas Llewellyn, charged with obtaining goods by false pretences. He obtained some articles of clothing by representing they were for his father. A strong appeal was made to give him another chance. Six weeks' hard labour.

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. Nearly 8,000 convictions last year. Complaints marked "Private," absolutely confidential.—SECRETARY, 105, Jermyn-st., London.

For the past two or three months the Spanish Prisoner has been rather quiet—indeed, any one less familiar than I am with the rascal's habits might have jumped to the conclusion that he was giving up business. I knew better. He was merely taking a little holiday—perhaps he went to Monte Carlo to dissipate some of his ill-gotten gains—and now he has returned to his labours like a giant refreshed. Every day copies of his harrowing letters from Madrid and Barcelona are reaching me with suggestions that it may be useful to publish another warning against this venerable swindle. Hence this paragraph, though I know very well that, in spite of all the warnings that can be published, the Prisoner will always find greedy and gullible fools to prey upon.

An officer writes to relate how a small boy in whom he is interested has been taken in by the Dereham Road Cycle Co., of Norwich. This swindle has been several times referred to in TRUTH. The firm issues to the prospective customer a circular, distinctly implying that its machines are supplied on credit, to be paid for by monthly instalments. It is headed conspicuously, "Yours to ride and enjoy from 5s. monthly. Pay while riding." On the circular is a form for the order and remittance of first instalment. When the dupe has filled up this order and sent his money, he receives an acknowledgment in another printed circular, in which he is informed, "as stated on circular which we sent at your request, the cycle is sent on the last payment." So far as I can see, nothing of the sort is said in the first circular, and every means is used to convey the exact opposite. In addition to the words quoted above, the original circular invites the customer to "note reduced credit prices," and this is obviously intended to deceive, since the person who is to give the credit is not the company, but the purchaser, who is to pay his money month by month for a year or more until he gets his machine. I am very glad to do my best to show up swindles of this kind, but those who complain of them would do far better to address themselves to the papers which publish the advertisements of such firms.

A touting Irish moneylender, rejoicing in the name of R. Cantwell, seems to have persuaded himself that he may find likely victims among English solicitors holding appointments as Clerks to Petty Sessions, Clerks to District Councils, and so forth. I have a considerable pile of circulars, which he has lately addressed to such officials, dated from 6, Lower Ormond Quay, Dublin, and transmitted in unsealed envelopes with halfpenny stamps, though endorsed "personal." For the credit of the profession it is to be hoped that this Dublin bloodsucker is mistaken in supposing that men of that class will be so imprudent as to fall into his toils.

Mr. William Taverner, of old-age pensions notoriety, has migrated from Greenhithe to Congleton, where he appears to have taken a substantial freehold edifice called West House, which is to serve as headquarters of his National Old-Age Pension Trust. I have received one or two communications on the subject from different quarters, but I can only refer those who are interested in Taverner's doings to what has already been said about him and his Trust in the columns of Truth since 1904, when he commenced operations. The story is too long to go into again, and if, in spite of all that stands on record against Taverner, including the observations of Mr. Justice Kekewich in dismissing his last appeal in the litigation with the Spurgeon Memorial Sermon Society, silly people persist in subscribing money to this "Trust," they will deserve to pay the penalty of their own folly and carelessness.

A good example of the reckless language with which Taverner imposes upon people is to be found in a letter that he wrote the other day to the Congleton Chronicle. In this he explains that an "auxiliary scheme" has been suggested by which needy women may be enabled to rent rooms at 1s. or 1s. 3d. per week, and that West House, Congleton, has been selected as a "cosy spot" for a start, "though it was hoped to have similar settlements in other parts of the country, maintaining West House as the headquarters." In other words, as if the pension scheme were not sufficiently handicapped by its own inherent financial rottenness, he proposes to invest funds in purchasing freehold houses for the purpose of providing lodgings for women on a charitable basis. Having explained this, he proceeds to say:—

> Sir, there goes out from West House several million pounds annually in the form of pensions to the utmost corners of the Kingdom, and needy women and maiden ladies are made comfortable here in their declining years.

Observe the use of the present tense. He treats his visionary scheme, which anybody with the slightest knowledge of such matters can see at a glance has not the slightest hope of living for a dozen years, as though it were already an accomplished fact. The most charitable view to take of him is that he is really not responsible for his own utterances. Unfortunately, that does not make him less dangerous, as the subscribers to his scheme will find out to their cost in due course.

A CHOICE OF EVILS.

(By a Wimbledon Liberal.)

Although I'm vowed to Free-Trade laws,
And hate Protection's rot,
I shall, next week, make common cause
With Chaplin's little lot;

Because, while barring him who'd set
A ring round Britain's riches,
Still more I bar his foe, who'd let
The women wear the breeches.

It is an ingenious move of Lord Courtney and the advocates of proportional representation to put their scheme in the form of a permissive Bill for the use of municipal corporations. No one can seriously object to such a Bill being passed, and if it became law, and any municipalities chose to adopt it for the purpose of local elections, it would bring proportional representation to the test of practical working, with the certainty that if the experiment were successful this method of election would soon take its place all round in our political institutions. I do not myself see how any one, whatever his political views, can object to Lord Courtney's scheme on principle, for it ensures that candidates will be returned at the poll in exact accorddance with the preference expressed by the electors collectively, and protects equally the rights of majorities and minorities.

There has hitherto been an idea that this is impracticable, but the scheme of the Proportional Representation Society makes voting a perfectly simple matter from the point of view of the elector, and whatever difficulty there may be in working out the arithmetical results falls solely upon the returning officer and his staff. The experimental poll which the Proportional Representation Society recently carried out is said to have shown that these difficulties are not very great, and that a longer list of candidates than would ever be presented in actual practice can be dealt with in a very few hours.

Where this scheme will probably incur most hostility is among the existing party representatives and organisations. There is a prevalent idea that proportional representation would make away with our present party system altogether. This I doubt, for the existing party divisions have struck their roots down very deeply into national life. But undoubtedly proportional representation will introduce novel complications into electioneering, and serious difficulties into the organisation of parties in the constituencies. It is also likely to make an end of very big party majorities, such as have been the rule in Parliament of late years, and to check to some extent the excessive swing of the pendulum at general elections. This would not be an evil. Much the same result would follow from the payment of election expenses from public funds, coupled as it must be with the second ballot. Lord Courtney's scheme has the great advantage over the second ballot that the issue as between all candidates is decided once for all at a single poll.

What we have witnessed during the past week in connection with the Preferential Trade proposals of the Colonial Premiers ought at least to bring home to every one with the welfare of the Empire at heart, the vast possibilities of mischief involved in the scheme. It was a foregone conclusion that the Home Government would resist the motion, and in doing so it was bound to state its reasons. It would have been false to the first principles for which it fought at the last general election had it taken any other course. In stating its reasons the Home Government was no less bound to contend that the colonial proposal, whatever advantages it may promise to the Colonies themselves, offers material disadvantages to the Mother Country. Mr. Asquith stated the case from our point of view as considerately and politely as was possible without abandoning his case. But however sweetened by mildness of language or geniality of sentiment, the unpleasant fact remains that Australia and Canada ask us to do something, and that we refuse; that they profess to be actuated solely by disinterested regard for the solidarity of the Empire, and that we have to point out in reply that they stand to gain by their generosity, and we stand to lose.

Outside the Conference the debate thus started is continued without ceremony or any restraint of politeness. The Opposition press seizes the occasion to hold up the Government to scorn as snubbing the Colonies and disregarding the interests of the Empire. The supporters of the Government develop the case against the Colonies, and point out the delusive character of the tariff reductions they have already offered, and the further advantages they would gain at our expense if their proposals were accepted. The attempt to make party capital out of the business on one side is necessarily met on the other by representing the Colonies as interfering in our domestic affairs, and seeking to do a good stroke of business for themselves under cover of promoting Imperial unity. When this state of discord is created by the mere discussion of the abstract principle in the Conference, one can get some idea of the bitterness of the questions that would arise if it ever came to settling a preferential tariff between the Colonies and the Mother Country.

In a forcible letter to the Times the other day, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P.—who looks at the matter from the Labour point of view, and by the light of a recent tour in Australia—went through all the preferential items of the Australian tariff, pointing out in detail their individual insignificance and their collective futility. He may be right or wrong, but imagine a complete series of tariffs drawn up for the Home Country and each Colony and submitted to this process of criticism. The criticism would be inevitable, and would be expressed with brutal frankness, for not only are men of business predisposed to believe that they are getting the worst of every bargain which the Government makes for them, but there would be in each country an active and intelligent Opposition, bent on proving that the Government had made a mess of it. In the Colonies it would be declared and believed that colonial interests had been in a dozen particulars sacrificed to those of the United Kingdom. At home it would be declared and believed that to an equal extent the Colonies were gaining at our expense. A more certain method of promoting discord and ill-will the mind of man can hardly conceive. Yet this is what is offered to us as the infallible specific for binding the constituent States of the Empire together in an unbreakable union!

Two leading journals in Canada and New South Wales last week published articles, the substance of which was that in view of the last general election, the proposal of a Tariff Reform resolution at the Conference is an interference in the domestic affairs of this country, that could do nothing but harm, and that the Colonial representatives had no mandate or excuse for taking such a course. This is a striking proof that there are people in the Colonies who see the mischief that must follow from raising a Party issue in an Imperial Conference, and identifying the representatives of the Colonies with one or other of the parties at Westminster.

Mr. Deakin and Sir Wilfrid Laurier were careful to say that they have no desire to interfere in our domestic politics. They could not say less, but a man must take responsibility for the natural consequences of his own acts. The natural consequence in this case has been to furnish Opposition speakers and writers with a useful cry against the Government, and to give their Leader an opportunity of winning enthusiastic cheers at a Primrose League meeting at a moment when his popularity with his party was rather under a cloud. This sort of thing is hardly calculated to inspire amiable sentiments towards the Colonies among Englishmen, the majority of whom are for the present on the side of the Government. If the consequences are not really serious it is only because Liberals are not accustomed to treat Imperial interests as party assets, and are therefore ready to take this sort of thing lying down.

The following letter which I have received from a well-known public man, quite unconnected with party politics, has some bearing on the foregoing remarks:—

Dear Truth, In common with many others who believe in Free Trade and voted accordingly at the last election, I somewhat resent the action of the Colonial Premiers in raising the question of preferential tariffs at the present Conference and furnishing picturesque headlines to the Daily Mail and the Morning Post. It is not as if they could have any doubt about the reply they would receive on behalf of the Government. They know on what issue the Government came into power. Why then raise the question at all?

Let me put a parallel case. As well as a Free Trader, I am, as you know, a strong Churchman. As such, I have an idea that the Church of England furnishes one of the strongest links which unite the Empire. The Church in the Colonies is practically one with the Church at home, and the tie is strengthened by the fact that the Mother Church in England supplies the daughter Churches in the Colonies with Bishops and with a large number of the parochial clergy. I am also a firm believer in the principle of State Establishment. I hold that England would be the worse for Disestablishment, and that the Colonies would be the better for State Established Churches. Further, it seems to me that if the Church of England were an Established Church in the Colonies as at home, it would act far more effectually than it does at present as a tie uniting the Colonies to one another and the Mother Country, in a word, as a bond of union between the whole Empire.

I have never preached this idea. But suppose it preached authoritatively, and taken up with enthusiasm by many, as it doubtless would be, and a league formed, and furnished with unlimited funds to give effect to it. Suppose that the movement grows in England and the Colonies, until at last we come to an Imperial Conference, at which a representative of the Home Government moves that it is desirable in the interests of Imperial unity that the Church of England be set up as a State Establishment throughout the Empire. Will any one say that such a resolution would be wise or expedient? Would it not be resented by the Colonies as an impertinence, and an interference by the Home Government of their right to manage their domestic affairs in their own way? I have omitted to put down as part of the hypothesis, that prior to the Home Government moving this resolution at an Imperial Conference, the question of establishing the Church had been fought out at general elections in all the Colonies and decided in the negative. This is necessary to make the parallel complete.

Will any Protectionist, native or colonial, explain how this hypothetical case differs from what has just taken place in London?—Yours obediently, Gamma.

THE INDISCRIMINATE SLOGGER.

The Subject of my this Week's Song
Is Swipes, a Batsman bold and strong,
Who, scorning Caution's Arts as tame,
Would rival Gilbert Jessop's Game.
So when he to the Wicket went,
He's all engrossed with this Intent—
To swell by Leaps and Bounds the Score
And trounce each Ball he got for Four.
But good though his Intentions were,
Therewith Performance didn't square;
More oft than not, before he's set,
Some Trimmer he would chance to get—
Such Ball as not a man alive
Could slog and the Attempt survive.
Thus, Victim of his uncontrolled
Impatience, he was beat and bowled.
Dejected, then, and gloomy-faced,
Pavilionwards his steps he traced,
Threw peevishly his Willow down
And cursed his Luck with moody Frown.

"'Tis sinful rough that I should aye
Fall Victim to my sporting Play,
While Men who hit with equal Dash
And out, as I do, reckless lash,
Get all the Luck to me denied.
There's Jessop ——"
"Ah!" a Friend replied,
"When Jessop for the Bowling goes
He some Discrimination shows—
Calls to his Muscles' Aid his Wit,
And picks the proper Balls to hit."

Moral.

Full many a Risk must needs be faced
By Punters who'd grow rich in Haste.
Yet while none such their Thousands make
Who know not when a Risk to take,
None, either, e'er have Fortunes won
Who know not when a Risk to shun.

SCRUTATOR.

THE TERRIBLE TEUTON.

MANY efforts have been made of late to arouse this country to a proper sense of the awful danger which threatens it every moment from the direction of Germany. None of them, however, has been so calculated to convince even the most indifferent as a letter which the Globe published last week. The writer was a military man—Lieut.-Colonel J. M. Heath—and his professional knowledge of military matters, no less than the impossibility of supposing a bearer of the King's commission to be a prey to imaginary fears, lends additional weight to his specific statements. A previous writer had used the columns of the Globe to warn the nation of the presence of 90,000 German Reservists in the British Isles. The Colonel supplements this alarming information. He warns us of the impending seizure, not only of our powder magazines and "other important points," but, worse than that, "the person of his Majesty himself," by a sudden movement of the foreign legions lurking in our midst. From his own observations he gives the following significant evidence of the imminent ripening of the plot:—

> The streets of London, as any one must observe, swarm with Germans. Where do they go? They appear in no hurry. [Of course, they are simply waiting for the signal.—Ed. Truth.] They are comfortably dressed and well nourished. Undoubtedly soldiers. I have noted them with interest for years. They are unusually numerous now. We shall awake one morning to find all important commanding points in London held by armed Germans, the railways cut, bridges blown up, and points destroyed. Our War Office officials must be well aware of this great danger to the nation, but their hands are probably tied, and they dare not speak with a Government in power such as ours.

What shall we do to be saved? The gallant Colonel recommends that ammunition sufficient for immediate action when the blow falls should be at once issued to every soldier and volunteer in London. That would be better than nothing. But there is the difficulty pointed out by the Colonel that the War Office can do nothing with Ministers in power who naturally desire to be turned out of office by German bayonets, and to see the person of their Sovereign consigned to a German dungeon in order that the Kaiser may reign at Westminster. The first step, therefore, is for the patriotic "War Office officials," who know what the Kaiser is up to, but are afraid to mention it, to seize the persons of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and his colleagues, and consign them to the Tower. That done, the ammunition can be served out instantly, and all other necessary precautions taken. Hyde Park, the Bank of England, the Zoological Gardens, and other strategical points should be strongly fortified; mines should be laid in all the sewers and tube railways; the Channel Fleet should be anchored in the Pool, and submarines should patrol the river above London Bridge, as well as the lakes in the various parks. No measure that prudence and common-sense suggests should be omitted.

The most terrible feature of our situation is the difficulty of opening people's eyes. I have had myself a number of communications about Lieutenant-Colonel Heath's disclosures. One of them—I am sorry to say the writer is a soldier himself—suggests that the Lieutenant-Colonel is a practical joker, pulling the leg of an innocent editor in order to make fun of those who seek to frighten us into our senses. Another falls foul of the editor of the Globe, whom he denounces for publishing nonsense calculated to make Englishmen the laughing-stock of the rest of the world. Such is the reward of a patriotic journalist striving to save his country from impending destruction. For my part, I have no fear of ridicule. When the German legions now loafing aimlessly in the streets of London get the signal to mobilise at Charing Cross, there will be no more laughing. I should like, therefore, while there is yet time, to help the Globe by calling attention to the frightful dangers incidental to the German opera performances at Covent Garden. Under cover of a "Wagner Cyclus"—such is the diabolical treachery with which we are assailed—a small battalion of German infantry may be, and probably is, mustered every night in the heart of London. I have myself studied these sinister foreigners, both the principal artists and the chorus. As Colonel Heath so acutely observes of the other warriors he has detected, "they appear in no hurry." They sometimes keep the game up from 4.30 p.m. to close on midnight. "They are comfortably dressed and well nourished," some of them a trifle over-fed. "Undoubtedly soldiers"! Look at Herr Kraus—the very figure of a Pomeranian Grenadier, though perhaps a little made-up at one place to disguise the truth. Incredible as it may appear, he is actually permitted, in the character of Siegfried, to forge a sword on the stage, and brandish it, uttering bloodthirsty cries in German! Very possibly one of these nights he will cry, "Krieg—Mobil!" and give the signal for which all the Kaiser's soldiers in London are waiting. And the only force we have at hand is a couple of sentries outside the theatre, and a few policemen at Bow-street station over the way! This is the sort of thing that goes on "with a Government in power such as ours." It only shows what an intrepid race we are that the Globe continues to be published night after night within a stone's throw of a spectacle calculated to strike terror into the bravest. But there is a point at which courage becomes mere foolhardiness. One can only trust that the Editor of the Globe has acted on the warning he publishes, and served out ammunition to all his staff, in readiness for the worst.

It will not have escaped observation that Prince Bülow last week delivered a speech full of pacific assurances, and strongly deprecating the violent language of certain German speakers and writers in regard to the alleged designs of this country and its King. I call attention to the significant fact that this speech was delivered within twenty-four hours of the publication of Colonel Heath's letter in the "Globe." The milk in the Chancellor's cocoa-nut is thus explained. Through their army of spies in this country the German War Office have their eyes on the gallant British Colonel and the Editor of the Globe. They recognised in a moment that their designs were unmasked and in danger of defeat. At all costs means must be found of preventing the issue of ammunition to the sentries at Buckingham Palace and the London Volunteers. Hence the Macchiavellian speech to the Reichstag. Are we going to allow ourselves to be fooled like this? Heaven forbid! It is the duty of the sapient officials at the War Office to disregard all delusive official declarations at Berlin, and proceed relentlessly with their preparations. Other insidious means of disarming our suspicions have been adopted by the Kaiser. At his instigation German newspapers affect to be afraid of an attack from England. German Heaths are put up to talk about a surprise attack on the German fleet by the British, and to pretend that the Germans may wake up any morning to find their sea-power destroyed for ever, and the Union Jack flying at Kiel. No one can suppose that an intelligent and well-informed nation believes this sort of rubbish, and the inference is obvious, that it is merely designed to throw dust in our eyes. The same motive evidently inspired the German politician who made such an alarmist speech about the designs of King Edward. He pretended to see the King of England everywhere, plotting at all points the destruction of the Fatherland, just as Colonel Heath sees the Kaiser's men rendezvousing in Regent-street. As if any one, especially in Germany, could seriously entertain such suspicions about an English Sovereign. It is all part of the plot to throw us off our guard. Let us look at facts. The Wagner Cyclus is still in full swing. Well-fed Germans still perambulate the streets of London without interference from the police. We must allow no dust to be thrown in our eyes. I was very glad to see that the Times published last week a letter warning British journalists of the danger of accepting at this crisis the invitation that has just been given to our pressmen to come over to Berlin and fraternise with their German colleagues. That is the right spirit in which to meet the treacherous Teuton when he offers us his hospitality. Who cannot see through his game? He hopes to "nobble," with his wretched sauer-kraut and blut-wurst, the men who, like the Editor of the Globe, have detected and are unmasking his designs. It may even be a part of his infamous scheme to seize the moment when some dozens of the bravest and stoutest patriots among us are withdrawn from their posts, to strike his blow in London, and possess himself of the person of his Majesty. Picture the fate of the nation if the whole of the company at Covent Garden should break loose while the staff of the Daily Mail and the Globe are dozing unsuspiciously in a Berlin beer-garden! No, no. Whatever happens, the press must not be caught napping. This is no time for international junketings. It behoves us to arm to the teeth, and let the world know that Britons do not know what fear is, nor even nervousness.

LORD PORTSMOUTH AND THE GROUND GAME ACT.

The Earl of Portsmouth has written two further letters, one to the Prime Minister and another to the Times, in reference to the case of his late tenant, Mr. Charles Parsons, which was first ventilated in Truth a fortnight ago. Not being in a position to deny the authorship of the remarkable letter in which he threatened Mr. Parsons with expulsion from his farm if he continued to exercise his rights under the Ground Game Act, his lordship carefully avoids any allusion whatever to that damaging document, and seeks to make it appear that the notice to quit was given for entirely different reasons. It is only natural that Lord Portsmouth should be anxious to divert attention from the letter, for it constitutes the most important piece of evidence in the whole affair. What are the facts? Mr. Parsons had been the tenant of a large farm on Lord Portsmouth's estate in Hampshire for some twenty-seven years, when at the beginning of 1903 he was informed by the agent that he—in common with other tenants—must cease to kill hares. The Ground Game Act gives a tenant the right to do this, and ever since the passing of the Act Mr. Parsons had exercised this right. He had shot hares quite openly, but not until after his landlord had enjoyed his sport, and he had always left a good stock for breeding. There had never been any complaint of a scarcity of hares on the farm, and as a rule Lord Portsmouth made the best bag of the season when he shot there. Mr. Parsons refused to give up his right under the Act, except on the condition that compensation should be allowed him for the damage that his crops would suffer if the hares were not kept down. The very reasonable suggestion as to compensation was ignored, and Lord Portsmouth addressed to Mr. Parsons a letter—published in full in last week's Truth—containing the following passage:—

> . . . If you or any other tenant insist upon your power under the Ground Game Act of constantly disturbing the land in pursuit of ground game, I must at once and frankly say that I must adopt the only remedy which I possess of changing tenants or farming the land myself. . . . The sum and substance of the whole matter is this, which no interview or talking over can affect, that if you cannot accept in good part the advice which Mr. Asprey proffered, with, I can assure you, the most friendly intention, it would be fairer to both parties for you to arrange to leave, which I trust would be conducted on both sides with perfect courtesy and consideration.

In answer to this letter, dated January 25, 1903, Mr. Parsons wrote two days later that after considering the matter he had decided that in the circumstances it would, perhaps, be better that he should, as his lordship suggested, give up the farm that year. "My quittal," he added, "will necessarily be somewhat irregular, but I have no doubt it can be arranged, as you say, 'with perfect courtesy and consideration.'" Lord Portsmouth did not take Mr. Parsons at his word—in fact, the latter was told by the agent that he would hear no more about it, "as it would never do for it to be said that he was turned out for shooting a hare"—and the matter quietly dropped for the time being. Mr. Parsons continued to shoot hares, but did so, as he had always done, with a due consideration for his landlord's sport, and nothing more happened till August, 1905. Lord Portsmouth then gave Mr. Parsons notice to quit at Michaelmas, 1906, when he accordingly left his farm after an occupation extending over thirty years.

In his letter to the Prime Minister, which was read in the House of Commons last week, Lord Portsmouth says:—

> . . . Mr. Parsons, had truly been a tenant on my estate for many years; but he had only been enabled to occupy the farm so long, because my father and I had from time to time given him very substantial assistance in abatements and remissions of rent. He was not given notice to quit for any bonâ fide, fair, and reasonable exercise of any rights under the Ground Game Act, but because, owing to his impecuniosity and absence of stock, the farm was rapidly deteriorating.

As I have previously explained, it was contrary to the wishes of Mr. Parsons himself that publicity was given in these columns to the circumstances under which he quitted the farm. But Lord Portsmouth's letter concerning the Ground Game Act was in other hands, and when it was placed at my disposal it seemed to me that in view of the light it throws upon an important aspect of the land question it ought to be made public. Though Mr. Parsons, however, had no desire to rake up the scandal of his expulsion—for a scandal it was—Lord Portsmouth's attack upon his credit and reputation as a farmer has naturally aroused his resentment, and brought him out into the discussion. It is a grossly unfair attack. In the Times of Monday Lord Portsmouth gave particulars of what he describes as the very substantial assistance that he and his father gave Mr. Parsons in abatements and remissions of rent. The abatements were only such as, during the years in question, were being granted by landowners in all parts of the country. As to the remission of arrears, Mr. Parsons took the farm on a ten years' lease at a very high rent—the highest that had ever been obtained for it—in 1876, just on the eve of that period of depression from which agriculture has never yet fully recovered. Not only were there rapidly falling prices for agricultural produce, but there came what a Royal Commission declared to be an unprecedented succession of bad seasons. It was impossible for the land to bear the rent that Mr. Parsons had agreed to pay, a fact which the then landlord acknowledged by making a reduction in 1881, when, in accordance with a provision of the lease, Mr. Parsons had given notice to terminate his tenancy. Even then the rent was found to be too high, but though a substantial amount of arrears undoubtedly accumulated, Mr. Parsons was evidently considered a desirable tenant, and at the end of the first ten years he was granted another lease for a similar term at a further reduction, while subsequently to that the arrangement was, by his own wish, altered to a yearly tenancy. Lord Portsmouth mentions the amount of arrears which he remitted in 1893, but he omits to mention that those arrears covered a period of ten or twelve years, during which every landowner in the country was suffering losses of rent; that Mr. Parsons paid down a sum of £250 towards the amount of the arrears, and that the balance was remitted as an inducement to him to continue his tenancy. At the time he received notice to quit Mr. Parsons had long been clear of all arrears and his rent was punctually paid down to the date when he left. The accusation of impecuniosity now made against him is, therefore, ungenerous if intended to refer to the difficulties which, like every agriculturist, he had encountered in former years, and unfounded in reference to the latter period of his tenancy. Lord Portsmouth also speaks of the absence of stock on the farm. Mr. Parsons affirms that the farm was stocked to its fullest capacity, and that he left the land in a thoroughly good, clean condition. The suggestion that it was rapidly deteriorating is, indeed, refuted by Lord Portsmouth's own further statement that he was at once able to let the farm at an increased rent. The fact, too, that immediately he quitted Lord Portsmouth's estate he obtained the tenancy of a larger farm from another noble landowner in the same county is a conclusive proof that Mr. Parsons is not regarded as a bad or impecunious farmer.

To my mind, Lord Portsmouth's explanation of his treatment of this tenant is anything but convincing. Although he implies that the question of the shooting of hares had nothing to do with the serving of the notice to quit, I observe this passage in his letter to the Times:—

> As to the manner in which he exercised his rights under the Ground Game Act I maintain that he abused them, and he says he did not, and there the matter must rest.

Read in conjunction with the letter of January 25, 1903, this is certainly significant as an indication of his lordship's views on the subject. Certainly, too, it seems to bring him within the category of those landlords whom the Prime Minister had in his mind when, in a recent speech, he alluded to the exaltation of the interests of sport at the expense of agriculture. In the circumstances I am not surprised that this disclosure of Lord Portsmouth's conduct as a landlord has created an impression that he is hardly in his right place as a member of a Ministry pledged to deal thoroughly with the whole land question.

THE ATOMIZER AND THE SOLICITOR.

In Truth of March 13 the following paragraph appeared:—

> One of the latest additions to my list of Yankee medicos with specifics for various complaints is N. Tucker, M.D., Mt. Gilead, Ohio, U.S.A., who is represented over here by A. Q. Tucker, of "Onaway," Half-moon Lane, Herne Hill, S.E. The Tuckers present an asthma specific to the asthmatic public for £3, this including an atomizer and 4 oz. of an inhalant. As a very good atomizer can be purchased at any chemist's shop for 3s. 6d., the charge for the treatment on the face of it seems exorbitant. Some people even describe it in much stronger terms. Dr. F. J. Waldo, the City Coroner, for instance, in the course of an inquest held at the beginning of the year upon a labourer who died from consumption, and who had been dosing himself with "Dr." Tucker's specific, stigmatised this kind of dealing as a fraud.

It will be seen that my criticism was entirely directed to the fact that the specific is sold at the price of £3. On the appearance of this paragraph I received a letter from Mr. Francis Henry Venn, of F. Venn and Co., Solicitors, 13, Gray's Inn Square. Mr. Venn said that he thought "the strictures were not supported by the facts"; that the Tucker Atomizer was "very different from the scent spray articles sold at comparatively low prices"; and that he had "used the Atomizer and fluid for three or four years with the greatest benefit." He also offered to show me the instrument if I cared to see it, and concluded his letter with these words:—

> I know nothing of Mr. Tucker personally, or of the company with which he is connected, and I have had no communication with him on the subject.

As the result of this letter I deputed a gentleman to see Mr. Venn and the instrument. He reported to me that Mr. Venn considered himself to have been highly benefited by the Atomizer, but he said nothing in regard to the nature and price of the instrument and the inhalant which led me to think that the TRUTH paragraph required modification. On April 19 Mr. Venn wrote again as follows:—

TUCKER'S ATOMIZER.

DEAR SIR,—Referring to the previous correspondence in this matter, your representative called on me on the 28th of last month, when I produced the Atomizer for his inspection, and gave him what information and assistance I could. I was informed by him that a paragraph would appear in TRUTH of the 10th instant, qualifying the strictures contained in the paragraph in TRUTH of March 13. I have not seen any reference to the subject in TRUTH of the 10th or 17th instant. If I have missed it will you kindly refer me to the page?

If no such reference has appeared, I shall be obliged by your informing me whether any further reference to the paragraph appearing in TRUTH of March 13 is intended.—Yours faithfully,

FRANCIS HY. VENN.

My representative who saw Mr. Venn denies that he informed him that such a paragraph as he mentions would appear, and as he had no authority to do so, Mr. Venn's impression on this point must be the result of a misunderstanding. In reply to Mr. Venn's letter I wrote to him on April 22 that as I had received no communication from Mr. Tucker, I saw no occasion to refer to the matter further, adding that possibly Mr. Tucker might prefer that I should not do so. This letter was written on April 22. I heard no more from Mr. Venn, but on April 30 I received the following formidable epistle from Mr. Tucker:—

"Onaway,"
Half Moon Lane, Herne Hill, S.E.

SIR,—My attention has been called to a paragraph in TRUTH of the 13th March last, commenting upon Dr. Tucker's Asthma Specific and Atomizer, and Mr. Venn has sent me a copy of his correspondence with you on the subject.

I am the General Manager in charge of the Distributing Office for Europe for Dr. Tucker.

Mr. Venn, in his letter to you of March 15, has correctly described the manner in which the Specific and the Atomizer are introduced to prospective purchasers. The articles are sent, in the first instance, on request, and on approbation, without payment or deposit, and are accompanied by a pamphlet containing all material information. There is, of course, no concealment or misrepresentation. One of the pamphlets is enclosed with this letter. The terms of trial and purchase appear on page 80.

If the person to whom the articles are sent derives no benefit from the treatment, or considers the price excessive, he returns the articles, having incurred no expense or liability beyond the return postage.

The Specific is a very special preparation and is to be judged by results. As to these, I refer you to the pamphlet.

The Atomizer is a scientifically constructed instrument, specially adapted to the purpose for which it is intended, and is the result of much care and study. It is patented, and has been improved on from time to time. I observe from the correspondence that one of our Atomizers was produced by Mr. Venn to your representative.

A very serious cause of complaint against you arises in consequence of the imputation or suggestion of fraudulent dealing contained in the following words of the paragraph read with the context: "Some people even describe it in much stronger terms," and in the reference to an inquest on a labourer who died from consumption, in which Dr. J. F. Waldo, the City Coroner, is said (with reference to the Specific) to have "stigmatised this kind of dealing as a fraud."

I had no notice of the inquest, and consequently no opportunity of satisfying the Coroner that the imputation of fraud was groundless. I have been informed that a doctor present at the inquest told the Coroner that his remarks were not justified. There was, in fact, nothing approaching to fraud or misdealing on my part in connection with the matter.

I wish to speak with respect of a gentleman holding an official position, but I am entitled to say that it is not in accordance with justice or fairness to make a public charge of fraud in the absence of the party charged.

The words, "One of the latest additions to my list of Yankee medicos," are also very offensive and objectionable. I understand that the list referred to is that appearing on page 4 of your "Cautionary List."

The paragraph complained of is immediately preceded by one relating to a person described as a trickster, and followed by paragraphs relating to persons against whom charges of dishonourable conduct are made or suggested.

The mention of Dr. Tucker's name and my own in such a connection is, in itself, a great indignity.

Dr. Tucker's professional title is given in inverted commas, suggesting that he uses a title to which he has no right. There is no ground for this suggestion. Dr. Tucker is a regular graduate of the Allopathic School of Medicine, known as the Bellevue Medical College of New York City, and has been engaged in practice for about 27 years at Mount Gilead, Ohio. He is duly authorised to use the titles of Dr. and M.D. The Specific was perfected more than 15 years ago. It has become well established in the United States and Canada, and, later, in Great Britain and Europe. The London Office was opened in 1899, since which year I have acted as General Manager in this country. I have occupied "Onaway," at Herne Hill, the house in which I now reside and carry on business, since 1902. The business is an extensive one, and has been honourably conducted since its commencement.

If you had had the fairness, prudence, and courtesy to communicate with me before making the reckless imputations appearing in the paragraph, it would have been made quite clear to you that there was no ground for any animadversion.

As it is, a very great injury has been done to Dr. Tucker and myself, both in reputation and property.

The injury may be lessened to some extent, but not undone, by a full apology and withdrawal of all imputations, and I call upon you to publish such an apology and withdrawal with the least possible delay. If it does not appear in next week's number of TRUTH I shall instruct my solicitors to commence proceedings for obtaining redress.

Please address your reply to this letter to my solicitors, Messrs. F. Venn and Co., of 13, Gray's Inn Square, W.C.—Yours obediently,

A. Q. TUCKER.

The Editor of TRUTH.

I have much pleasure in publishing Mr. Tucker's letter, but I regret that I do not see my way to comply with the request with which it concludes. The point of the original paragraph was that "the charge for the treatment on the face of it seems exorbitant," having regard to the price at which very similar articles can be bought at chemists' shops. Whether the price is exorbitant or not is a matter of opinion. Mr. Tucker is at liberty to hold his own opinion on this point, and every tradesman is entitled to put what price he pleases on his own goods. But I am equally entitled to my opinion as to whether the price is exorbitant or not, and nothing in Mr. Tucker's letter leads me to modify it. With regard to the observations of Dr. Waldo at the inquest, they were made publicly, and Mr. Tucker is entitled to answer them. He appears to have left them unanswered for many weeks, in fact some months. I do not know the exact date of the inquest, but the Lancet, from which my information as to the Coroner's remarks was derived, referred to it in its issue of March 9, and in doing so endorsed the Coroner's observations with very much stronger remarks than any to be found in the TRUTH paragraph. Mr. Tucker's letter implies that he knew something about this inquest. He did not, however, think it necessary to offer any public reply, either to the Coroner or to the Lancet, until April 29. He only did so then, as he himself states, in consequence of somebody having called his attention to what had been said in TRUTH seven weeks previously. It seems to me that in the absence of any reply from Mr. Tucker, either to Dr. Waldo or the Lancet, he cannot fairly complain that another newspaper should, at a later date, have referred to Dr. Waldo's observation; and that I have done all that he is entitled to ask for, or that justice requires, in publishing now what he says above in reply to Dr. Waldo's remark. Mr. Tucker can hardly expect me to take him seriously when he says that a very great injury has been done to him in reputation and property by a paragraph of which he knew nothing until somebody else informed him about it some six weeks after its publication and only a few days before he wrote this letter to me. Men who find their property injured are not generally so long in discovering the cause of it. But even if Mr. Tucker had suffered as he alleges, the natural explanation is to be found in the observations of the Coroner, and their repetition in the Lancet, and in his own failure to offer any reply to them for several months, not in a mild reference to them in another journal many weeks after they were delivered. At any rate, Mr. Tucker—thanks to the gentleman who called his attention to the Truth paragraph—has now had his opportunity of answering the Coroner, and if the result is not all that he could desire the fault will not be mine.

As regards Mr. Tucker's other complaints about the paragraph, they appear to have no relevancy to the point which I raised. He can have no reason for "understanding," as he says he does, that in speaking of "my list of Yankee medicos" I referred to the "Truth Cautionary List," for, if he has consulted that publication, as he purports to have done, he must have seen that it is merely a précis of matter that has already appeared in Truth. I am sorry that the reference to "Yankee medicos" is not to Mr. Tucker's taste, but that is not my fault. His letter shows clearly that Dr. Tucker is a Yankee medico, and the business which is carried on in connection with the Asthma Specific only illustrates the very wide difference between a Yankee medico and a qualified medical practitioner in this country. I am pleased to know and to make known the degree which the Doctor bears; and I am ready to believe the best of the "Allopathic School of Medicine known as the Bellevue Medical College of New York City." But Mr. Tucker must know as well as I do that it is not the custom of reputable medical practitioners in this country to trade in proprietary specifics, and that no one holding an English degree of M.D. would be allowed to remain on the Medical Register for long if he resorted to such a practice. In this country, therefore, Dr. Tucker is only a "Dr." in the American sense, which is the reason why I put his title in inverted commas. I see that in the pamphlet which explains the virtues of the Asthma Specific, the Doctor publishes a certificate that he is a "regular graduate of the Allopathic School of Medicine," "in good standing in the profession," "a gentleman possessing the highest moral character," and "worthy the confidence of all." This certificate is signed by about twenty individuals and business firms. Like the Doctor, they no doubt mean it for the best, but Mr. Tucker would do well to understand that the publication of such a document by a medical practitioner in this country is calculated to convey precisely the opposite impression to that intended.

The other complaint about the paragraphs in Truth in juxtaposition to that about the atomizer did not, I feel sure, originate with Mr. Tucker. It is an objection which I have frequently met with in dealings with lawyers who are hard driven to make out a case, and think that "every little helps." In this instance it happens to be most offensive and unjust to the firm whose business was referred to in the paragraph which followed that about the atomizer. They are a perfectly respectable firm, and no suggestion whatever of "dishonourable conduct" was made against them in the paragraph referred to. That they themselves did not consider it so is sufficiently shown by the letter I subsequently received from them in reply to the paragraph. I am almost tempted to wonder whether the gentleman who called Mr. Tucker's attention to my remarks on the atomizer is thinking of turning his attention next to this other firm.

For all these reasons I must decline to publish the "full apology" which Mr. Tucker asks for, and I take the liberty of adding that I do not think he is well advised in asking for it, accompanied as it is by the reference to his solicitor. On receipt of his letter I wrote to ask him who it was that had called his attention to the Truth paragraph. The reply comes from Messrs. Venn and Co., and states that Mr. Venn sent "our client" a copy of his correspondence with me on April 23, and that "our client" first saw the paragraph on April 29. Mr. Tucker therefore despatched his letter to me on the same day that he saw the paragraph. The letter itself bears every appearance of having been written by somebody else and presented to him for signature. In the original draft even the date had been left blank, and it is filled in in Mr. Tucker's handwriting. The letter, as drafted, ended with the words, "I shall instruct my solicitors to commence proceedings for obtaining redress." Mr. Tucker has himself written in the concluding paragraph, "Please address your reply to this letter to my solicitors, Messrs. F. Venn and Co., of 13, Gray's Inn-square, W.C." In view of these circumstances, and the fact that Mr. Tucker had down to April 29 offered no public reply to Dr. Waldo's observations, I find it difficult to regard his demand upon me for an apology, and the threat with which it is accompanied, as the result of his own spontaneous volition. His letter, with its lawyer-like statement of every point that can be made to tell in presenting a case, bears every indication of having been "inspired" by somebody else. It reminds me of the "meaning thereby" which I have occasionally seen in documents bearing the signature of a member of the Junior Bar, and placing constructions upon perfectly just and reasonable observations which fill with amazement the man who wrote them. Instigated and prepared as it has evidently been, and put forth when much stronger observations upon the Asthma Specific in other quarters have been left unanswered for weeks and months, I cannot look upon it as the spontaneous utterance of a man who feels that he has a just grievance. Nor do I think that any one else is likely to do so.

NEAR AND FAR EAST AT EARL'S COURT.

The Great Wheel has had its day and ceased to be, but the list of attractions at Earl's Court is so long and varied, that after all a little thing like that is scarcely missed, and the management have wisely left unmoved, if not untouched, the rest of the old familiar amusements in which year after year a multitude of visitors find an unceasing delight. To a good many people Earl's Court would not be Earl's Court unless they could revel once more in an exhilarating rush down the water chute or along the switchback railway, enjoy again the giddy gyrations of the Maxim flying machines, or indulge in the less exciting experience of a voyage round the lake in a gondola. But though these and other pastimes can be enjoyed as of yore, it must not be supposed that there is any lack of novelties for those desiring them. On the contrary, there is this year a more than usually liberal provision of new side shows, so that those hardy country cousins who swarm to Earl's Court during the excursion season and spend ten or twelve laborious hours in a conscientious attempt to see everything that there is to be seen, will still leave for their midnight trains lamenting the fact that the programme is too full to be got through in the time. There are visitors of another class for whom the chief charm of Earl's Court is not an endless round of all sorts of entertainments, but an evening's al fresco enjoyment in the Western Gardens—a good dinner at the Quadrant Restaurant or the Old Welcome Club, and an hour or two pleasantly wiled away in listening to the strains of one of the crack military bands and watching the crowd of promenaders in the brilliantly illuminated grounds. Here, by the way, a vast improvement has been carried out by the removal of some of the buildings in the corner near the restaurant, and the formation of a pretty Italian garden with a fountain in the centre.

It is just as well to mention these things first, because they are really the most important in the estimation of a large proportion of the Earl's Court public. Still, there has to be an exhibition of some kind, so many people want it as a pretext for going to what they would otherwise regard as a too frivolous place of entertainment. It pleases them to think that they have been drawn there by the exhibition, even if they bestow but scant attention on the exhibits. No doubt there are also visitors in whom the ostensible object of the whole show does awaken a serious interest. On the present occasion it is a Balkan States exhibition, and the idea of holding it was suggested to the Earl's Court management by the Balkan Committee in London. It was a very happy idea. The Balkan Peninsula is vaguely known to the man in the street as a place where there have been heroic struggles for national freedom, where political troubles are always brewing, where another war is said to be imminent every spring, though fortunately it does not come off. Beyond such hazy notions he knows little or nothing of the different countries and peoples, so that this exhibition introduces him to an entirely new world. The Governments of Servia, Bulgaria, and Montenegro have all warmly supported the scheme, and the result is a display of the arts and industries and products of those States which is a welcome revelation of the peaceful progress they are making. From the point of view of international trade the exhibition will have its uses, while the merely curious visitor will see plenty of things to interest him, and, in particular, the "working exhibits," where workers brought over from the Balkans are plying different handicrafts, are sure to be centres of attraction. So, likewise, will be the troupe of native peasant dancers and singers, accompanied by a genuine Tzigane band, whose performances are given in the theatre in the Balkan Village. That is, of course, the old village which has figured under other names in previous years, but which has again been cleverly transformed by the scene-painters in keeping with the character of the rest of the exhibition, or rather, the rest of it with the important exception of the entertainment in the Empress Theatre. For this the management have boldly gone on from the Near to the Far East, rightly heedless of any charge of irrelevance or incongruity. Neither Servians, nor Bulgarians, but Japanese, are in possession of the theatre, which has been skilfully converted into a picturesque representation of an old Japanese village, with its Buddhist temple—a faithful reproduction of a portion of the temple of Nikko—pagoda, and monuments, its tea-house garden, with an arbour of wistaria, and its foaming waterfall splashing into a pond of lotus. In a row of village shops Japanese fan-makers and fan painters, wood carvers and engravers, and artificial flower makers are at work, exhibiting their extraordinary skill and dexterity, and on the stage of an open-air theatre, Japanese dancers, acrobats, and jugglers give some remarkable performances to the accompaniment of a Japanese orchestra. Altogether, "Old Japan" is as beautiful and interesting a show as any that has been produced in the Empress Theatre, and certain to contribute very largely to the success of this year's exhibition at Earl's Court.

THE THEATRES.

"Brewster's Millions," at the Hicks.

Go and see "Brewster's Millions." I will tell you why you should. Because, although you may not be in the least inclined to laugh on arriving at the Hicks Theatre, you will certainly do so before you go away. And what is there in this world better than genuine laughter, stirred neither by the misfortunes of others nor by any other than legitimate means? It is one of the pure pleasures spoken of by the Greeks, and prized as being free of that terrible element of passion which counts for so much in so many things. But pray do not run away with the idea that "Brewster's Millions" is a comedy which carries one into the sphere sublime of Platonism. On the contrary, the plane upon which Brewster squanders so conscientiously the £250,000 with which he is encumbered, is essentially mundane, not to say Stock-Exchange-cum-Racecourse.

Largely, the success, the notable success, of the new comedy at the Hicks Theatre, new to London last Wednesday evening, is due to Mr. Gerald Du Maurier. For he it is who works so hard to distribute this large sum within the brief limits of the time appointed by the millionaire. It must be explained that the vast sum of two millions comes to Montgomery Brewster if he shall have spent a quarter of a million without giving it away, in the given time. This is almost all the plot there is, and one would not have believed there was so much fun to be got out of so simple an idea. I have not read Mr. George Barr McCutcheon's story, from which it is dramatised by two gentlemen previously unknown to me, so that I cannot say exactly how much of the astonishing variety of incident is due to them and how much to Mr. McCutcheon. Should they or the author like to send me the original work, I shall be pleased to pronounce upon that knotty question.

Mr. Du Maurier, then, is from the beginning working full steam, at first in the hall of Montgomery House, where he has the bad fortune at once to win heavily on a rank outsider and to buy for the fall in the most risky of American insecurities. The outsider wins, and the stock rises so rapidly in the market that the unhappy Montgomery Brewster has to close his account at a heavy profit. This fills with joy the souls of his fiendishly friendly staff of clerks drawn from the ranks of his boon companions. For, like good fellows, they cannot bear to see their chief squandering his fortune, and the miserable Montgomery is bound by the terms of his eccentric agreement not to divulge the method in his madness. Petticoats, of course, come into this story, as they do into most stories worth having, and many that are not. A scheming vixen lays her toils for Montgomery, and a "nice girl" winds his memory round her heart, and looks on at his ruin with tearful eyes of love. When this is almost achieved on the s.s. Flitter, whereon Mr. Brewster and his friends have been touring at the former's expense, the two girls have a scene, in which Peggy proves that hearts are trumps.

Of course, all comes right in the end, though Montgomery is within less than an ace of losing his two millions, and finding himself also penniless. Those who have not ascertained from the papers how near a thing it was, will do well to wait in blissful ignorance until they go to the Hicks Theatre and see for themselves. I am sure that I enjoyed the first night's performance the more for having been careful not to inquire how it all ended.

One very important ingredient of Wednesday evening's success was the admirable setting and stage management of the storm, on board the yacht. The vitreous green waves were rendered in a nauseating manner as the yacht began to heave with the swell, and they rose higher and higher as the tempest increased and the wind howled. Mr. Winchell Smith, one of the adapters of the play, is I see, credited with the staging also. Perhaps it is he who should be congratulated. In any case, the other adapter, Mr. Byron Ongley, has a clever colleague.

Shakespeare, at the Waldorf.

The past week has been nowhere more completely filled than at the Waldorf Theatre, where our American visitors have indeed given us a taste of their quality. Let me say at once that Mr. Sothern and Miss Julia Marlowe have proved in their highly interesting, thoughtful, restrained, and sympathetic renderings of Shakespeare that they are both in the great tradition, yet in no slavish manner, for they bring to the interpretation of the text, as it were, a breath of the fresh Western breeze from over Atlantic. In their single performance of "Hamlet" Miss Marlowe's Ophelia grew upon one, as the play advanced, and in the great scene where Hamlet turns and curses her, she touched every heart in the theatre. Mr. Sothern's was what one might call an intellectual Hamlet. His rendering was extraordinarily alert. In "As You Like It" Miss Marlowe is perhaps temperamentally not an ideal Rosalind, her gaiety now and then appearing a trifle forced; but the excellence of her Juliet, which is the best performance so far given by our visitors at the Waldorf, caused one to regret that she and Mr. Sothern did not open their brief season with this ever young and ever beautiful tragedy. It was surprising to note how carefully this rendering of "Romeo and Juliet" was put on the stage, running, as it did, without a hitch, and displaying such refined taste, both in scenery and costumes. Nothing was here overdone. It is difficult to select from so uniformly fine a performance, but in the potion scene Miss Marlowe rose to a great tragic height. Mr. Sothern, as Romeo, was a trifle dull in the opening scene, failing also to declare his passion in the balcony scene with any ardour; but, on the other hand, he put much vitality into his scene with Tybalt, and reached his acme of excellence in the scene with the Friar. Mrs. Brooke's delightful Nurse, and Mr. Vibart's admirable Escalus, Prince of Verona, stand out from an otherwise adequate cast.

* * * * *

At the Hippodrome, I have witnessed the genuine and successful exhibition of tree-sawing and the swinging of those potent axes which are used by Australian bush-rangers. The great deep-toothed double-handed saw tears through the hard wood of the blue-gum tree trunk, placed upon tressels in the arena for the purpose, in an astonishingly short space of time. The champion McLaren has a colleague, a man of mighty thews, who saws or hews with the aspect of an angry Titan escalading heaven. I recommend him to artists seeking a mould of angry pertinacity. A very large audience witnessed with interest this exhibition, which is varied as much as possible each time.

The Countess of Cromartie's little play, "The Finding of the Sword," produced last week at charitable matinées at "The Playhouse," is taken from her story of the same name. The strange story of the exhumation of the sword of the hero, who follows his weapon, was listened to with interest by a large audience on the afternoon of its first performance. Mixed up with the archæologist and student of Keltic, keen on his idea, is the story of the dreamy Keltic girl, who reveres the ashes of the dead heroes, and would not for all the world that they be disturbed. Not able to prevent this, she is the centre of attraction to the spirit of the dead hero, who returns to earth, and whom she remembers as having once in a former life been her master, when she was his slave. Finally she wills to be united to him again at all costs, and in a flash like lightning the ghost disappears, and the girl is found, presumably having attained her desire in spirit, but at any rate dead in fact. This whimsical tale, which reads more charmingly than it acts, suffers from a certain vagueness of presentment, and also from a strong sense of unreality, which was what really stood between oneself and enjoyment of it on that Tuesday afternoon. In the story, the authoress is able to add a thousand little touches which serve to attain the end, namely, that of this magical transmigration of a soul. In the crude limelight of the stage, these touches were largely absent, or when present were marred by the environment.

"Spectres of the Sanctum," Mr. Maskelyne's latest contribution to mediumistic exposure, now takes the form of a mistake in the identities of Chicago Smith, the millionaire, and one of the other Smiths, by profession a piano-tuner. Mr. Maskelyne himself plays the male "spirit medium," who is thus unconsciously fooled by the (intoxicated) piano-tuner, while believing that he is performing a similar operation upon Chicago Smith. The emergence of the "astral" wife of Smith from the side of Mr. Maskelyne is a marvellous optical delusion, and that of the "Mahatma" from India, who appears in full Oriental fig and then fades away gradually, growing fainter by degrees and "beautifully less," is also an exceedingly skilful example of what can be done with draperies, limelight, and intermittent darkness. The rest of the programme, all of which precedes "Spectres of the Sanctum," contains one number which seems to me a remarkable feat of artistry. I refer to Mr. Percy French's graphic display. He recites an absurdly amusing old monkish legend, of which he illustrates the episodes with chalk on a large piece of white paper. At the conclusion, he suddenly inverts his drawing, and we have before us a far more attractive work, containing sheep, a setting sun, a snowy landscape, and all the ingredients of sentiment. In Mr. Barclay Gammon, poor Corney Grain finds no slavish imitator, but an amusing successor, and the afternoon is pleasantly filled, for young and old, with other brief yet brilliant feats of "magic," music, and legerdemain.

The performance at King's College of "A May-day in Shakespeare's Time" was doubly memorable. In the first place, the object of the entertainment was worthy of all praise. "The Guild of Play" and "The Guild of the Brave Poor Things" (these latter cripples) work hand in hand for the benefit of poor children. They appear to be doing excellent work in Bermondsey, and those who may be desirous of assisting, pecuniarily or personally by the telling of stories or the teaching of singing and dancing, can obtain all the information required from Mrs. C. W. Kimmins, Dame Armstrong House, Harrow-on-the-Hill. In the second place the performance itself was noteworthy. A crowded audience enjoyed a variety of old English songs and dances, among which the May-pole was perhaps the most effective, and the appearance of Queen Elizabeth visiting the Earl of Sussex and Sir Walter Raleigh, who spread out his cloak on the ground with historical accuracy, was the moment of much applause. The traditional singing games, such as "Round and round the village," "Old Roger is dead," were most charmingly enacted, and the curious dumb show of the performance of "Apple Tree," for instance, where the child is the tree, probably reflect a very early period of the drama, while they make one think of the cast of the "Midsummer Night's Dream." The minuet at the conclusion was followed by the old song "Here's a health unto his Majesty," and a march in which all the performers took part. I hope this innocent yet erudite, this charitable and at the same time highly entertaining performance, may often be repeated in the future, with such variations as ingenuity may suggest.

THE COMPLETE CATECHIST.

The County Championship Catechism.

(For the Use of Would-be First-class Cricketers.)

Q.: Who are you?

A.: A County Cricketer.

Q.: What is a County Cricketer?

A.: A man who plays for his own, or more frequently for some other County.

Q.: For what other County?

A.: For the County that offers him the most attractive terms.

Q.: Into how many classes may County Cricketers be divided?

A.: Into four: The Amateur-Amateur, the Salaried-Amateur, the Imported Colonial, and the Professional.

Q.: What is the Amateur-Amateur?

A.: The gentleman of means, who plays cricket for love, plus hotel and travelling expenses.

Q.: What is the Salaried-Amateur?

A.: The gentleman without means, who plays cricket also for love, and at the same time discharges the onerous duties of deputy-assistant-sub-secretary to his County Club at a salary of three hundred a year.

Q.: What is the Imported Colonial?

A.: The player especially shipped over from South Africa or Australia to become the pride and the glory of an English County.

Q.: What is the Professional?

A.: The candid individual who is frankly paid to play, and makes no attempt to conceal the fact.

Q.: Is this the only respect in which the Professional differs from the other three varieties of cricketer?

A.: No; there are two further points of difference. When he goes in to bat, he leaves the Pavilion by a sort of back door; and his initials do not appear before his name on the score sheet.

Q.: What is the Champion County?

A.: The County that sometimes without, but more often with, the aid of imported Colonials, or other outsiders, wins the greatest number of matches during the season.

Q.: What is poaching?

A.: The infamous practice of enticing the promising young players of one County to throw in their lot with another.

Q.: Are all the Counties guilty of this infamous practice?

A.: All, except one.

Q.: Which is that one County?

A.: One's own County.

Q.: What is a fast bowler?

A.: A fast bowler is of two kinds—the fair trundler and the unfair thrower.

Q.: Define the fair trundler.

A.: The fast bowler who is on your side.

Q.: Define the unfair thrower.

A.: The fast bowler who is against you.

Q.: When is a batsman "out" l.b.w.?

A.: Never—in his own opinion; sometimes—in the umpire's opinion; and always—in the bowler's opinion.

Q.: Describe the conduct, respectively, of (a) the batsman, (b) the bowler, when one of the latter's deliveries just misses the former's wicket.

A.: The bowler clutches his top hair with both his hands, and the batsman walks solemnly out and pats the pitch.

Q.: Why do they indulge in these proceedings?

A.: The bowler—to indicate his sense of the batsman's extraordinary luck; and the batsman—to indicate where the responsibility for his weak stroke really rests.

Q.: Does the responsibility for the batsman's weak strokes always rest upon the pitch?

A.: Not always. They are sometimes to be accounted for by the bad light.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

WE had a phenomenal May-Day, in the alternations of high wind, hail, rain, sleet, snow, and a few short bursts of sunshine, one of which came in time to welcome King Edward after his long journey in the most wintry weather. He had left behind in Italy an almost summer climate tempered with the freshness of spring, and he came into a Polar one directly he had shot through the Simplon tunnel. It was, if possible, more inclement at Pontarlier and through the Burgundy hills. As he approached Paris the sun began to show itself. The mood of the capital which the King knows so well and loves so dearly answered to the meteorological sulkiness. He found Paris almost in a state of siege, dissimulated, it is true, as much as could be by the police authorities, and in a fit of black ill-humour. All traces of gay and elegant life had disappeared from the Boulevards, which had only crowds of aimless, ill-dressed men on strike. They embraced garçons de café, cooks, scullions (whom we call plongeurs), hairdressers' assistants, and journeymen bakers. The cafés and their terrasses were empty, landlords moved about in them in solemn silence, chasing with their napkins the few flies that had dared to face the foul weather. Thinking that perhaps the King's visit might bring them customers if things at once reverted to the normal, they had the day before yielded to Jules, Achille, Auguste, Emile, and Joseph in the matters of pourboires and the freedom of the upper lip from the razor. But as they had refused to negotiate through the secretaries of syndicates, the strike went on. Hence the forlorn aspect of restaurants, cafés, and beer saloons. The King could not have felt at home in his old haunts. They were as a house in which a death recently took place, and where, the heir not yet having entered into possession, everything remains hung up.

Edward VII. arrived here officially incognito, but openly, and evidently very much himself, and with his usual surroundings. To be incognito is not to put on a disguise or to enter into another skin. It is simply to notify that the regal personage, in going incog., wants no fuss to be made about him. On this point the French Government complied strictly with King Edward's wishes save in one respect—that of sending M. Lane with the Foreign Minister and the Prefect of Police to receive him in the name of the President as he stepped out of the train.

The sun had come out as the Royal train drew nigh, but the last fall of sleet had been too recent for a West-End crowd to gather round the Bois de Boulogne station. Nursery maids and children had, however, come out. No flags fluttered anywhere. A thick mat had been laid down on the platform and the stairs up to the station house, and a carpet laid down over it. This and the group of official notabilities, which Sir Francis Bertie joined, were all that announced the expected Royal visitor.

The King is more bronzed than when he came here with the Queen, is less stout—a good sign, taken in connection with the healthiness of the complexion and an air of well-being. He received the compliments of M. Lane, the official secretary of M. Fallières, of M. Pichon and of the Prefect of Police, standing on a step of his saloon carriage. Their top hats had been doffed, and remained in their hands. The King's light-brown "melon" remained on his head. It could not have been otherwise, as he had to hold his cane and to shake hands. It was noticed that he leans less heavily on his cane than a few years ago—another good sign.

Motors awaited Edward VII. and his party. The instant he entered the foremost one, off it started, en route for the Hôtel Bristol, where King Leopold has been staying to be more in the shade than in that transparency the Elysée Palace Hotel, where the Argus eyes of Americans, Britishers (home and colonial) were all the time focussed on him just as though he were a Shah.

The Royal motor goes first in a string of motors, contrary to the rule observed in cortèges made up of horse-drawn vehicles. It would never do to subject the chief personage to receive full in the face those petrol puffs the motor gives out.

The strikes have fizzled out, sinews of war failing from reluctance of strikers to contribute any longer from their invested savings to a fund. Three-fourths of them have money in Russians. The best French stocks are lower than when waiters, bakers' assistants, and others who struck, invested in them. Better times are hoped for. The wisest course meanwhile would be to return to work and add, if possible, to savings. The landlords had offered two days before the end to yield on the pourboire and moustache question, but refused to negotiate through secretaries of syndicates. The conclusion concludes nothing, but I hear that an easier rein will be given in regard to freedom of the upper lip from the razor.

I have been asking a waiter why his corporation so much insisted on this freedom. He said that the obligation to keep a clean-shaved upper lip had many serious disadvantages. The shaving came to a good round sum at the end of the year. It was gone through early in the morning, a severe grievance in cold weather, when waiters had to stand each waiting for his turn in long files at the barbers' shops. To be sure of getting through the operation in time for punctual attendance at one's café, one had to rise too early after a short night's rest. Few waiters at the late cafés or beer saloons can be in bed before half-past one in the morning. Another consideration—when Jules, Achille, and their brethren go out on their seventh-day holiday, ladies to whom they offer their arms know them to be, from their shaved upper lips, not landlords, but garçons, and treat them accordingly. This is galling. It often spoils the holiday. One returns to one's café with bile in one's blood. Another drawback: When a waiter laughs inwardly at a customer, his shaved upper lip betrays him if he is not a hardened stager. The shaved upper lip is too frank for the business of constantly trying it on—pour l'art de plaçer des crevettes. The customer who fancies the waiter derides him finds fault with everything, especially with the bill, and forgets to give a pourboire, or gives a contemptibly shabby one. This tells against the man with his fellows and the patron, and he gets a bad name in the business and only finds bad situations when out of place.

Again, the amiabilities of waiters to ladies who frequent cafés are often thrown away. They think the shaved upper lip a badge of servitude, which it is in a time when all but priests and actors wear the moustache. The popular notion is that landlords forbid the moustache to prevent the "suction" of heel taps of fine wines remaining from dinners in cabinets particuliers, and the eating on the stairs of left-off delicacies. What can be more galling than this notion? It reduces the waiter to the level of a low pilferer with whiskers. The worst reproach that M. Jules Ferry ever met with was that of resembling a garçon de café. Directly he married Mlle. Risler she made him grow a moustache to do away with the likeness.

Again, when there is anything the matter with the skin of the upper lip—a cold-blister, a mosquito bite—the moustache hides it, whilst the razor would irritate it. Very few town-bred men reared on poor food have good teeth. The moustache conceals bad teeth. Normans generally have gaps in the front of their mouths. It was Norman waiters who led the way to the Bourse du Travail to declare the strike.

I remember when no advocate could wear a moustache without incurring the censure of the bâtonnier and losing the ear of the court. Most civilians kept the upper lip shaved before the Crimean war. Conversation used to be greatly helped by the visible play of the upper lip, as the effect of stage dialogue still is.

The increased number of fine art salons reduces the interest and value of those of the Champ de Mars and Champs Elysées—both held at Le Grand Palais, as you may know. The great mortality among the original members who exhibited at the former has made sad changes. We also miss the light and simplicity of the Palais de l'Industrie, and of the no less demolished galleries at the Champ de Mars, and begin to find out and suffer from the defects of Le Grand Palais. The want of light in the ground floor galleries, the inconveniently arranged stairs, back-stair corridors, and the depressing court make it an undesirable place for pictorial exhibitions on a great scale. In the square rooms or the garden-court of the Palais de l'Industrie, one could take in at a glance all the notable or interesting people, who went more to see and be seen on the private-view day than to gaze at the paintings. If one only saw heads in the square rooms one saw the whole figures in right perspective in the spacious court. One at once perceived how bonnets harmonised with flounces, how character asserted itself unconsciously in dress, gait, and manner; took in le dernier cri de l'élégance, triumphs in things sumptuary enough to make Carolus Duran despair, or Blanche to fling his maulstick at some Anglaise on the canvas before him. One never suffered from want of air. This kept off headache, to which one is so liable in trying to bring away a correct general impression of a Salon immeasurably spread. Each visitor to the Grand Salon now complains of being assommé there. Effects are so broken and dispersed that he must run hither and thither for a whole day, or days, to see as much as one took in at the Palais de l'Industrie in a dozen glances or so.

The king of the Champ de Mars Salon is President Fallières, by Bonnat. This is a portrait worthy of its precursors in the Bonnat series of the Republican Presidents of this Republic. This series began with Thiers, skipped MacMahon, Casimir-Perier, and found subjects for masterpieces in Grévy, Loubet, and his successor. Every man of intellect differs greatly from every other. The generic resemblance of all is thrown into the shade by purely personal qualities. They are rather Europeans than Frenchmen, though there is something French in every one of the five—their attitudes, their clothes, their way of wearing them, and the spirit which leads each to reveal his idiosyncrasy, which if strong is reticent. This reticence in individual determinism (not determination) is one of the general features, but the least so in M. Fallières. He sits in an arm-chair looking straight forward, with his hands resting on his thighs. It is prodigiously like to the model or subject. One might almost fancy M. Fallières seated on the terrace at Lupillon, with neighbours who had come to tickle the muse of light, gay poetry and to taste of his famous white wine. And yet he has a very serious character. He is very much the good fellow, shrewdly intelligent, and, as President of a highly civilised democracy, the right man in the right place. This is so apparent that I fail to see why the hanging committee, on second thoughts, had the vis-à-vis picture removed on the eve of the official private view. This painting represents a Palestine "she ass and her colt" (Anesse et l'anon), by Bareilles, and now hangs in Salle 31. They are just the thing for a scene in a Passion Play giving the triumphal ride into Jerusalem. The name of the anesse is Rigolo and that of l'anon Bijou.

M. Détaille had again this time the honour of taking King Edward over the Champs Elysées Salon, and a redoubtable one he must have felt it, as his Majesty had but an hour to spend there. The selection of paintings worthy of being admired had, therefore, to be severe. When many are called and few only can be chosen, there must be weeping and gnashing of teeth, and particularly among artists, a class with not much culture outside of their art, and extremely vain. The King could contemplate the President of the United States in a light grey suit, and replacing, as the vis-à-vis of his good brother Fallières, Rigolo and Bijou. He is not sufficiently Teddy R. the matchless, the impayable, the man who has best represented the prodigiously vast West, with all its prospects, realities, and possibilities, at the White House. This presentment of one of the strongest personalities of the United States is from the pencil of a lady. She is American and a Marquise by the Pope's grace. The Montagnini papers have given her an enigmatic interest which does as well to gather a crowd of salonniers as any other. They all wonder was it she who had the very rigolo idea of bringing M. Clemenceau and M. Piou together at a lunch at her house. Queen Alexandra had the amiability to sit to her. Her Majesty's portrait is also exhibited at the Grand Palais.

The keenness of competition between the studios may be measured by the attention paid to journalists and by artists of high merit. No less than thirty-six portraits of notable or simply active journalists hang in the good places at the Artistes Français Salon (Champs Elysées), to say nothing of those at the Champ de Mars. They figure in the painting of the Augurs, of whom there are thirty-two, by Lassement. Ferrier's portraits are worth looking at again and again. They are this year of women only. It is an article of his artistic creed that the women of the Third Republic are incomparably more interesting, often more beautiful, and sometimes of a much more heady charm, than those of the First and Second Empires. In his double portrait of a mother and daughter by adoption he gives a lady verging on the pensively sad autumn of life. She places her hand on the shoulder of the girl beside her in an attitude of protection. The latter is the picture of ingenuous innocence and fresh and unassuming as a field flower. The portrait of a Madame X. is that of one who receives the homage of universal admiration as due to her intoxicating loveliness.

Jules Lefèbvre's Giovannina is a splendid young Italian wench, good for a model, brim full of vitality, and ready to flare up into a Vesuvian fire of passion, but possibly without any soft sentiment. Italians are more passionate than sentimental. J. P. Laurens, who so often covers acres of canvas, has painted, as if for a wager, quite a small portrait of his little grandson Pierre, a boy in his seventh year. Master Pierre is engaged, all alone, in a game of "only suppose." He is dressed as a mediæval ritter, and may fancy himself one of those German nobles who forced their Emperor to go to Canossa, and then reviled him for going. The little fellow is done with a crisp touch, and his budding genius for theatrical personation rendered with amusing cleverness and to the life. A fellow picture is of Pierre's sister, who might be eleven or twelve, and belongs to the Merovingian time. She is reading a monkish chronicle edged round with illuminated illustrations. This descent of a brush that is most at ease in the fresco style to the diminutive picture greatly interests.

A PEER AMONG THE PLAYERS.

I HAVE always been interested in the stage myself, and now that I've married Jessie, of course, I am a sort of an actor by adoption. Not that I was ever quite fool enough to put any money into it, even if I'd had any; and so I told an uncle of Jessie's that we found waiting on the doorstep when we got back to the flat on Thursday. He really seems to be a genuine uncle, a brother of her mother's who went to the bad and got on the stage that way. Jessie had to drop him long ago; he took to borrowing half-crowns of her dresser, for one thing, so we were not altogether pleased to see him—the more so that it was a pretty evident sign that people have been talking about us. I couldn't very well kick one of my wife's relations into the street, to begin with, and to tell the truth I found him rather amusing, even though I had to refuse to put any money—it's all Jessie's, really—into his scheme. Though I shouldn't wonder if there was something in it, and if you felt inclined to speculate, his (stage) name is Roderick Macalister. I don't know his address—probably hasn't got one—but he is a tall, thin, dark man, with rather long hair and a frock coat, that he always wears tightly buttoned, and that's gone green at the seams. He is always to be found at the bottom of Bedford-street, Strand, and I believe he makes quite a decent income borrowing half-crowns from fellow-actors that happen to pass, and forgetting to pay them back. Anyway, he's not altogether a fool, and he got his idea through two things that were in the papers during the week. One is the stopping of the "Mikado," and the others the living statuary boom. To put it shortly, he wants to bring out a play about Adam and Eve before anyone else does, and get a sort of trust in it; I didn't quite make out how.

He thinks that stopping the performances of the "Mikado" means the end of the stage, as it is run now. He calls it the thin end of the wedge. If they won't let you do a play about Japan, for fear of hurting the Japs' feelings, he doesn't see that they can very well let you do one about France, or Russia, or America, or any other country. He points out that in the old legitimate the villain was always a foreigner, so you've got to bar out all plays of that kind, lest you hurt the feelings of the particular brand of foreigner that's villain. And all Shakespeare has got to go, too. He's always sneering at foreigners somewhere. The Danes might very well kick at "Hamlet" because it makes their Royal family such a queer lot; and the French are bound to object to nearly all the historical plays, because they are always being beaten in them; and the Italians, to say nothing of the Jews, would object to "Othello" and the "Merchant of Venice," and "Romeo and Juliet" and, in fact, you've got to give up Shakespeare. Macalister has gone through I don't know how many hundreds of plays, and he can't find one that's really safe. Old and new, they've all got some mention of foreigners somehow. It isn't only foreigners, either; there's the stage Irishman, and the Welsh—there's one in Shakespeare somewhere, Jessie tells me—and the Scotch. The next thing will be that Mr. Redmond and Mr. Lloyd-George, and Lord Rosebery himself, will begin to protest against them, on quite as good grounds; and, in fact, the stage is doomed. Because, even if a play should get through, you'll never get a manager to put it on, when there's always the chance of his being jumped on and made to take it off at a moment's notice.

On the other hand, as all this living statue business shows, they don't a bit mind your putting as many naked people on the stage as you like as long as you bring in some blithering clap-trap about it being art. It's wonderful, by the way, what your British public will stand in the way of clap-trap. What? The idea of all the bar-loungers and cheap clerks and corner-boys—not to speak of Members of Parliament (the Commons, of course)—crowding into the music-halls to see a lot of naked women, or so nearly naked that you can't tell the difference, because of their love of art is rather rich; but if you read the papers you'll find that there are all sorts of respectable old females of both sexes, especially those that happen to have once won a chromo-lithograph in a raffle and called themselves patrons of the fine arts ever since. You'll find, I say, that lots of them swallow it like milk and write the papers attacking the Philistines that want to banish art from the music-halls, and arguing that the popularity of living statues is a sign of the great increase in the appreciation of art in this country. Some of them ought to just knock about among a music-hall audience and hear the way the art-lovers talk. I'm not a Puritan myself—not by a long way—but I hate cant and hypocrisy, and I'd just like to ask some of the music-hall shareholders how they'd like to see their own wives and daughters doing the living statue business on the music-halls. But about the Adam and Eve play. Macalister's idea is to have it brought out at a big West End Theatre and get some well-known artist to design—not the dresses exactly, but the scenery and decorations and things—so that he can work the high art dodge for all it's worth and silence the opposition. He has worked it all out very carefully, even to arranging the minor details. He tells me that he was a bit gravelled at first, because he didn't see how he was going to get more than two leading parts into it, unless he treated the serpent allegorically. But, by a bit of good luck, when he was in a public-house somewhere off Museum-street, he ran across one of those queer people who spend all their lives reading up stuff that nobody else does in the British Museum—or did, before it was shut up. Macalister stood him several drinks—or says he did, though I doubt that part of the story myself—and found out that the old chap had made a special study of the Garden of Eden quite recently. Had had to read it up for some sort of a crank who wanted to start a new sort of city somewhere in the country, as far as I can make out, and base it on the way the Garden of Eden was laid out. The old chap had read all there was to be found out about it—in the Bible and the Koran and all sorts of other books—and he told Macalister that Adam certainly had two wives and probably quite a lot more. Macalister's idea would be to make them into the chorus, with a topical song, that he's written himself, about Free Trade and that sort of thing. Then, according to the old chap, there were all sorts of other people who could be brought in—earth-spirits and demons and creatures of that kind. After all, as Macalister says, historical realism doesn't really matter, because it's the costumes that will interest the audience most, and nobody knows exactly what did go on in those days really, and if any objections should be made, he knows a queer sort of parson chap that he thinks he could get to start a new religion, bringing in all the characters he wants, and boom the play that way. Macalister is a born enthusiast, but he believes that what between this parson and the artist man he would engage, he would get the whole bench of bishops, and all the leading Nonconformists to come one night—he'd have to send them free seats, of course—and all the Royal Academicians another, and that they'd write letters to him afterwards praising it up to the skies. He'd make it realistic, too—have dogs dressed up like lions (as they have at one of the theatres now), and a dragon like the one they have at Covent Garden in "Siegfried."

I see I have forgotten to mention one of the chief points upon which Macalister depends to make his scheme a success. It wouldn't offend any nation at all, because nobody knows exactly what country Adam and Eve really did belong to, nor exactly where the Garden of Eden was. So there wouldn't be any danger of the Lord Chamberlain's stopping the licence, or anything of that sort. In any case, the play isn't written yet, and when it is he's going to take special care that whoever writes it—he thought of asking Mr. Bernard Shaw or else Mr. Hall Caine, either of whom he thinks would write it quite as well as he would want it, and be able to see that it was properly boomed in the press as well—shall not bring in a single reference to any person or anything that has happened since the Flood, so that no nation can feel offended because its ancestors are libelled or any rubbish of that sort. But, as he says, the book doesn't matter much, he believes in gagging, and plenty of songs by the chorus, and dancing, and that sort of thing; I didn't really hear the whole of his scheme, because before he had finished he had drunk too many whiskies and soda, and ended up by offering to let me play the part of the Missing Link, which he thinks of introducing to attract the scientists. So I had to kick him out. But, considering what the public really does seem to like, I shouldn't wonder, I say, if there was money in it. And Jessie thinks so, too.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

WHETHER it was the English that made England, dear Lady Betty, or England that made the English, our condition is equally disquieting. If it was the former, and American, Continental, and modern influences are materially injuring our character, there is cause for alarm; if it was the latter, and scientific and mechanical developments are dispossessing England of the advantages she enjoyed as an island, the situation is disturbing.

The sea is the backbone of England; are we within measurable distance of the last of the sea? When a current of electricity can cause a seaquake that will sink every ship in its course, and winged man shall skim through space, the ocean will give us little else but fish and fresh air!

It may be said that good Premiers make bad Leaders of the Opposition; judged according to that process, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman is, certainly, an admirable Prime Minister, for Mr. Arthur Balfour has not distinguished himself as an opponent of the Government, nor has he given satisfaction to his followers. The fight for power now in this country is no longer carried on in the House of Commons and by Members; it is the newspapers that are the chief combatants, and the Cash Kings that control them as shareholders. The House of Commons of to-day is a mere ballot-box enlivened—or otherwise—by an occasional chatter-box.

The malicious story is told that recently the Woolsack was missing when the Lord Chancellor was to take his seat, but that the Lords put their heads together to provide an immediate substitute.

The rage for the sensational in this country has undergone a further development. The long-continued sensation, the mysterious murder, the slow-moving divorce case, and the procrastinating scandal, are now considered tiresome; the nation craves for Startletts. It is almost a New Human Nature that needs the misfortunes of others in tabloid form.

The sorrows of a connoisseur have been singularly ignored; they are described in the following letter that has been addressed to the present writer by a newly-married man:—

"Sir,—Some two months ago the announcement of my approaching marriage was published, as is the custom. Knowing that I am an art collector, my many friends sent me old prints, china, furniture, silver, and ornaments of various kinds and every sort. As most of those friends are inexperienced in the direction of art, I have now a store of absolute trash that distresses me indescribably, for many of these presents have cost large sums which are altogether wasted. Eighteen prints were sent to me at an average price of ten pounds; only two of them are genuine! The value of the other sixteen may be estimated in pence! It is the same with the china—most of it is imitation! Of the seventy odd presents I received, there are only twelve I can possibly place in my collection; the rest, if there, would cast doubts upon the hundreds of genuine specimens I possess. Imagine the amount of money that has been wasted! Besides, those friends who miss their gifts when they visit me will be pained, and I cannot tell them how grossly they have been deceived by the dealers.

"I have a suggestion to add to that which may be of some value. There are now many women who have taste, and considerable knowledge of the old, and are anxious to increase their income. Were they to act as art advisers to those who give old-world productions as presents, it might be of advantage to all concerned but the unscrupulous dealers. Were such a woman required to purchase for a customer a present of the kind not to cost more than ten pounds, she would probably find a desirable object for the price, and would secure a sufficient commission for her trouble.

"It has been calculated that David Cox must have painted for forty-eight hours in the twenty-four since he was six months old to produce all the water-colour drawings which are attributed to him, and that Turner must be still living, and working ceaselessly, to account for the pictures that are associated with his name! Two water-colours by David Cox and one by Turner were amongst my wedding presents—all spurious!"

There are thousands of conventional errors that it is time, in this enlightened age, to abandon; the centre of education in England has shifted—the "educated" class is uneducated, and the "uneducated" classes are educated; the men and women of the West End do not talk epigrammatically; the clubs are not palaces of pleasure; and this is not by any means so wicked a world as it is generally represented to be. It is a mischievous habit to label the world as wicked, when the experience of all who are observant proves there is much more good in ordinary human beings than evil. As a matter of fact, it is one of the most surprising circumstances of life how much good there is, and in the most unexpected quarters. There is a story, however, that may be told here to make a contrast between the contention and the undoubted selfishness which prevails. Two men were recently in the morning-room at a West-End club. One fell, seized with a stroke of paralysis; the other forthwith sat down, and wrote to the committee to complain of members having strokes in the club!—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THE Two Thousand has excited very little interest, and the betting on the race was on an exceedingly limited scale. It was decidedly the tamest Two Thousand day ever known at Newmarket, and the attendance was dolefully meagre, the weather being wretched in the extreme during the morning. When the numbers went up odds of 9 to 4 were asked for about Slieve Gallion, while 8 to 1 was offered bar one. As there was no general disposition to back anything except the favourite, the odds quickly rose to 11 to 4, and as much as 3 to 1 was betted in some cases, while 11 to 1 and 100 to 9 were generally offered bar one, Bezonian being nominally second favourite. Slieve Gallion won very easily at the finish, the running with Bezonian in the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster being accurately confirmed. There was one momentary excitement during the race, as Slieve Gallion either swerved or stumbled at the Bushes, while Higgs appeared to give him a cut with the whip, but in a few strides he was all right again, and the race was practically over. He came away after passing the Ab. M. winning post in fine style, and the manner in which he galloped up the hill was not indicative of any lack of stamina. The going was very heavy indeed, which must have been considerably against the favourite. Slieve Gallion is a remarkably handsome horse, but he is certainly a most excitable animal, and very easily upset. Captain Greer's colt was thoroughly well trained, and his admirable condition was most creditable to Darling. He made all the running, and he was always well in front. If this horse is beaten at Epsom it will not be for lack of stamina, but because the hill will not suit him. I have always expressed the opinion in Truth that the Middle Park Plate running was entirely wrong, and that it ought to have been ignored when discussing Slieve Gallion's chance of winning the Two Thousand and Derby. The colt had been seriously amiss, and it was obvious that he was not up to the mark when he ran at Newmarket in October. If he had been in his Ascot or Doncaster form on the Middle Park Plate day he would have defeated Galvani just as easily as he had beaten Bezonian in the Champagne Stakes. Slieve Gallion's next engagement is the Derby, and he is entered for five races at Ascot, where he will no doubt be reserved for the St. James's Palace Stakes.

Bezonian was mentioned by me last year as certain to turn out Lord Rosebery's best three-year-old, people being at that time generally infatuated about Traquair. Bezonian had undergone a careful preparation for the Two Thousand, but he is still capable of improvement. The tale that he could have been much nearer to the winner if he had been hard ridden is all nonsense and rubbish, and people who indulge in such cackle overlook the fact that Slieve Gallion certainly was not hard ridden at the finish, and showed no sign of tiring.

Linacre was supposed to be the best of the Newmarket horses by many good judges there, and if there had been another quarter of a mile to go he would probably have beaten Bezonian, for Mr. Clark's horse appeared to be running on, and he was certainly going faster at the finish than Lord Rosebery's animal.

All Black ran respectably, but he is an over-rated colt. I pointed out some time ago the outrageous folly of backing this animal for the Derby at the ridiculous price at which he was quoted, considering that he has never won a race. All Black was fit enough, and he had done well in his stripped gallops, but he is not a colt of high class. He can have no chance for the Derby while the animals which finished in front of him last week keep well. His next engagement is in the Red Rose Stakes of £1,000 at Manchester, and I should fancy he will now go for that race. He is in the Duchess of York Plate of £1,300 at Hurst Park on the Saturday before Ascot, from which race Linacre was withdrawn when the minor forfeit was declared about thirteen months ago.

Galleot, who had beaten Hymettus in a trial, was much fancied at Newmarket, but he was hopelessly outclassed, as also was the Kingsclere candidate Apponyi, and the Duke of Portland's colt is not likely to win any of the "heavy" races for which he has been left in. This colt is own brother to Pamflete. The Welkin was also outclassed, and Weathercock was so extremely backward that he might as well have remained in his stable.

The Derby betting now reported is as fantastical as the recent quotations on the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap. There is absolutely no genuine market on any future event whatever. Can it be credited that any sane and sober backer would be now found taking 4 to 1 to any considerable sum about Galvani for the Derby after Slieve Gallion's victory in the Two Thousand, and considering the poor running of Mr. Gilpin's horses so far as the season has gone? All the horses in this stable are backward, and the public exhibitions of Baltinglass and Weathercock have certainly not been calculated to encourage the friends of Galvani. I saw it stated on Friday that four monkeys had been taken about Galvani, which is a really incredible transaction. I do not believe in this animal as a Derby horse, and it is very doubtful indeed whether he can possibly be got fit by June 5. Then we find the French colt, Ouadi Halfa, quoted at 100 to 8 for the Derby, although it is actually all those odds against his starting at Epsom. The fact is that p.p. betting is absolutely extinct. The transactions now reported, about which so much elaborate fuss is raised, are altogether beneath contempt, being utterly paltry in amount, and representing only the harum-scarum fancies of foolish backers. Stable commissions are held back until the latest possible moment, and there is often no attempt to execute even a large one until the numbers have been up for several minutes. Heavy betting on the great weight-for-age races appears to be also a thing of the past. There was not nearly so much speculation over the Two Thousand as often takes place on a selling plate or a trumpery little handicap.

An owner of racehorses sends me an extract from the sporting article in a morning paper, and expresses himself in strong language as to the impudence of the "mischievous inventions" contained therein. The writer discourses on starting-price betting, and relates a truly wondrous tale of the client of a firm of bookmakers, who lays out "quite £100" every day that there is racing, and who bets on every race! The friends of this client had better look after him, unless, indeed, he is evolved out of the fertile imagination of the writer, and one is led to this conclusion when one finds it stated that he has won several hundreds of pounds this year. Only an idiot can believe such rot. There is another magician who is alleged to have won largely last year by laying odds on certainties but who had the marvellous good fortune not to speculate when Bachelor's Button was beaten at Newmarket and Pretty Polly at Ascot. This is the sort of gibberish one finds in a racing novel written by a woman. I agree with my correspondent that the circulation of even such preposterous fictions as the aforesaid is eminently calculated to induce eager and unsophisticated simpletons to make ducks and drakes of their money (most of them not being really in a position to waste a shilling) by following in the footsteps of this miraculous backer. No doubt there is an immense daily business in starting-price betting, and it is true that "legislation has had no effect on large credit transactions," but it is full time that legislation sufficiently drastic and comprehensive to stop such speculation altogether should be taken in hand. There is not a particle of "sport" in connection with starting-price betting by stay-at-home backers. It is pure gambling, and the horses are mere counters, and it would be easy to pass a Bill which would squabash the innumerable "Turf accountants" who so audaciously advertise themselves in many of the papers, and in several of these journals some such bookmakers are permitted to insert florid puffs of themselves and their business. Any measure to stop starting-price betting would certainly be supported by all the members of the Jockey Club whose approval would be of any value. If gambling of this pernicious kind were abolished, one result would be a considerably increased attendance at race meetings by the higher class of starting-price backers. Nobody having the very slightest practical knowledge of such affairs will believe misleading gibberish about backers indulging in constant speculation with the result that at the end of a season they have won "packets of money." The starting-price backer who finds himself a winner after two seasons of daily betting is a creature yet to be discovered, and as a rule he is decisively "settled" in a few weeks.

It is stated at York that arrangements have been privately made for the Corporation to lease Knavesmire to the Race Committee for a term of ninety-nine years, the rent being £800 a year, rising to £1,000. It is said to be contemplated before long to establish steeplechase meetings, in which case a course will have to be laid out. It has been rumoured that the racecourse is to be enclosed in order that it may be converted into a gate-money meeting. This is denied, but it is admitted that the present enclosures will be enlarged, which doubtless means that nobody will be able to obtain a view of the races without paying. A Bill to enable the Corporation of York to acquire Knavesmire for recreative purposes is now before Parliament, and it would be as well, in the interests of the general public, if the new arrangements concerning the racecourse were thoroughly investigated before the aforesaid Bill is passed.

Entries close next Tuesday for the Ascot Stakes, and the weights are to be published on June 6, being the day after the Derby. It is much to be regretted that £2,000 should still be added to this handicap, for an endowment of £1,000 would draw fully as many entries, and there would be quite as large a field. The Ascot funds should be principally devoted to weight-for-age stakes, which may be expected to bring out the best horses in training, and it is silly in the extreme to waste £2,000 on a handicap which is not likely to be contested by a single flyer. Nobody goes to Ascot desiring to see fields of platers. Last year Pradella won the Ascot Stakes, while in 1905 Sandboy was successful, and on neither occasion was there a single really good horse in the field.

Only twenty horses have been entered for the Somersetshire Stakes of £400 at Bath. There was a very much larger number of entries when this race was a sweepstakes with £100 added, and indeed it was then quite an important event among the second-class handicaps of the season. The most notable names in the list are those of Mr. Purefoy's Lally and Captain Orr-Ewing's Song Thrush.

The Salford Borough Handicap of £1,000 at the Manchester Whitsuntide Meeting has done very badly, only twenty-eight horses having been engaged. Considering that the distance is six furlongs, this is an astonishing failure, and not many years ago there would have been three times as many entries. Lord Howard de Walden's Lincoln failure, His Eminence, was entered, but he has met with an accident, and he will never run again. Sir E. Vincent has engaged both Ulalume and Cyanean. Mr. Neumann's Nero is entered, and so is Mr. Goodchild's Crusader, who is sure to win a handicap before long.

Nine horses have paid the minor forfeit for the Coronation Cup at Epsom, including Meadow Rue, Bilton Park, and the Russian horse Hammurabi. This race is run over the Derby course, and it will be the great event of the season if it brings out Keystone II., Velocity, Polymelus, Spearmint, The White Knight, Radium, Polar Star, and Troutbeck.

Backers demonstrated their incurable fatuity by eagerly accepting 11 to 8 about Lucian for the First Spring Stakes in a field of eighteen, but Lord Rosebery's colt is not a quick beginner, and, having got off badly, he was never really in the race. Littledale, who won cleverly for Lord Sefton, was not backed for sixpence. This colt, who is by Melton out of l'Ideale, was bred by Mr. Musker, and he cost 350 guineas at Newmarket last July. Stron Ard and Larig were favourites for the Hastings Plate, but Hymettus, who was so heavily backed at Sandown Park, won easily. Larig ran very badly, and it was a silly absurdity to back Lord Wolverton's colt because he was believed to be far in front of Slim Lad, who had run prominently at Sandown.

It was a mistake altogether to start Keystone II. for the March Stakes on Thursday, and for any one to back her in her palpably backward condition was sheer insanity, but the mare was positively made favourite. She ran very badly indeed. There was a lot of money for Gold Riach, but Mr. Bass's mare could not stay the course. The White Knight won cleverly at the finish from Slavetrader, who had 7 lb. the best of the weights. The White Knight is not yet properly fit, and it was a most creditable performance. This horse is no doubt the smartest four-year-old in training, and months ago I predicted that he would prove the best of the English lot in the Ascot Cup. Olympus had been well tried for the Newmarket Plate, but Lord Rosebery's colt got off badly, and the Duke of Devonshire won another race with his useful filly by Tarporley out of Lady Sneerwell. Olympus will win a race before long.

On Friday Polar Star was withdrawn from the Chippenham Plate at the very last moment, leaving this race a good thing for Bilton Park. Little Goose, who had been beaten earlier in the week, found no difficulty in winning the May Plate, for which race Cinderello had been put about as a real good thing. There were seventeen starters for the One Thousand, and Witch Elm was certainly the pick of the field. She won very easily from Frugality, and I do not see what is to beat her for the Oaks among the English fillies. Silver Heeled, however, had been amiss since she arrived at Newmarket, so her poor running may be ignored. Frugality is engaged in the Oaks, but she is far more likely to win the rich Coronation Stakes at Ascot.

Galvani has not made any considerable improvement since last autumn, and he has not given satisfaction in his recent gallops. It is a matter of absolute certainty that Mr. Gilpin's stable is at present altogether out of form. I have no belief in Galvani's Derby chance, and in my opinion Wool Winder will be the best of the Newmarket horses at Epsom if all goes well with him. Major Loder's colt can scarcely be got thoroughly fit by June 5.

I hear that Keystone II. will be prepared for her Epsom and Ascot engagements, and that after running for the Gold Cup she is to be turned out of training, with a view to her having a long rest before she goes to the stud next season.

I expect that Malua will win the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap on Saturday. This horse certainly ought to be able to beat Polymelus, Velocity, Gingal, and Polar Star at the weights. I fancy that Sagamore would have won this race if he had kept right.

Next week will be principally devoted to the Newmarket Second Spring Meeting, but there are also fixtures at Gatwick and Haydock Park. It may be hoped that there will be a considerable improvement in the weather at Newmarket, and there is sure to be a much larger attendance, as the King will be down for the meeting.

There were sixty entries for the Newmarket Stakes when this race closed in October, 1905, and forty-one horses were left in after the minor forfeit had been declared last July. The race will be worth £2,230. The field may include Perambulator, Linacre, Olympian, Simon Square, Knight of Tully, The Welkin or Prince of Orange, and Dripsey or Maya. I shall give a plumper for Linacre. There are fifty-four entries for the Payne Stakes, including Perambulator and Victoria, All Black, Earlston, St. Petersburg, Polar Star, Maya, and Larig. Polar Star ought to win, and All Black has the next best chance.

As to the two-year-old races, Vegor has a good chance in the Somerville Stakes, the entry for which race includes Cinderello, and St. Elf ought to win the Spring Stakes on Wednesday. The Bedford Stakes has thirty-two left in, including Malwood and Quelpart, and Mr. de Rothschild's colt ought to win this race. There are fifty acceptances for the Breeders' Stakes, and Quelpart is again entered here, his owner being also represented by Pastry, and each animal has a breeding allowance of 9 lb. The early two-year-old races are very dangerout to meddle with, and particularly at Newmarket, and they really excite very little interest, as the best animals in the various stables (or what are supposed to be the best) are of course in reserve for the Epsom and Ascot meetings. I hear of two animals in particular which are confidently expected to prove flyers of high class which are being kept for the New Stakes at Ascot.

THE COLONEL AND THE C.T.C.

I have received a long letter from Lieut.-Colonel R. Bazett, late R.A., in defence of the council of the Cyclists' Touring Club. He wants me to publish it in full. I cannot do so. But as he declares I am guilty of inaccurate statements and blackguardly conduct, I propose to deal with the writer at greater length than I should otherwise do. He tells me that he has been a member of the council for some years, and of the club for about twenty, and has been behind the scenes in the whole course of this acrimonious discussion. He proceeds—and the logical working of the Colonel's mind is stupendous—"I am, therefore, all the more surprised at seeing a journal with the reputation of Truth lending itself to the onesided and inaccurate statements as published in the issues of March 20 and 27." These articles he has only just seen. I strongly advise him to read some subsequent articles in Truth. Having accused me of inaccurate statements he does not point out a single one. This is grossly unfair. No doubt the Colonel considers my statements onesided. In dealing with the conduct of such a council as that of the C.T.C. they can be nothing else. There is only one side to the question. The Colonel does not give a single argument in the council's favour. He says the council only carried out the expressed wish of about three-fourths of the members in their action to enlarge the membership of the club. This is a gross misstatement. Only a third of the members voted, and while of this third 10,433 voted for, over 2,000 voted against the scheme, and the judge came to the conclusion that the voting did not represent the views of the club. As the Colonel has the effrontery to accuse me of inaccuracy without giving a single instance, I regret that it is my painful duty to have to correct him. His second argument is that when the application failed "the council decided not to appeal, although they had a large reserve fund to fall back on had they been so minded." I can only tell the Colonel that if the application did represent the wishes of three-fourths of the members, and if the council were advised that the judge was wrong, they should have appealed. I would remind him that the reserve fund was the money, not of the council, but of all the members of the club, to which neither he nor any member of the council is entitled in any greater sum than any other member of the club, and that to speak of that fund as belonging to the council is inaccuracy number two. As a matter of law, the appeal would have been hopeless. It would have been simply squandering club money to appeal. There is therefore no virtue in not appealing. He says the council resented what was practically a vote of censure (that is to say, a committee of inquiry) demanded by gentlemen who had been on the council not many years ago, who had assented to the council's methods, but who did not come forward for re-election, and so "other representatives more trusted by the membership were sent to the council." The sublime confidence displayed in that concluding sentence is superb. I refer him to the Daily Mail, April 29, where in an editorial on the result of the vote at Birmingham it is written: "More emphatic condemnation of a body of directors by the members of a company could not be shown," and I may add that after such a vote no self-respecting councillor would remain on the council. The present councillors are, as the meeting has shown, not trusted. No member of the committee of any respectable club would retain his seat after such a vote. The Colonel is no more justified in assuming that the past councillors assented to the methods of the council than I should be in assuming that he does. In fact, he admits that he does not approve all the actions of the council. The inference I draw is that the past members learned enough to realise that reform was urgent, and that inquiry was imperative, and to effect these ends it was necessary for them to have a free hand, and stir up the members to action. He considers the council act con amore for the interests of the club. This is, I presume, indicated by the fact that the council declined to nominate a committee of inquiry, and now protest that they do not object to inquiry by a representative and unbiassed committee. That protestation is pure hypocrisy. The same con amore, I suppose, made the chairman and treasurer refuse to serve on the committee. The same con amore has induced the council to refuse the committee of inquiry access to the club books. The fact is, the council works not con amore, but con Mr. Shipton, who, the Colonel says, is only the servant of the club, and therefore permitted to jocularly refer to his masters as donkeys.

Under article 37 the council is at all times to be bound by and to act in accordance with a resolution passed under such circumstances as was the one at Birmingham. Under article 56 a postal vote only binds the council for six months, or to the end of the current years, whichever may be longer. It is therefore clear that the vote at Birmingham binds the council absolutely. The postal vote, if not in favour of reform, is merely dilatory. It is a genial waste of £65. Why does the council want six months' grace? The refusal of the council to disclose the club books until after the result of the vote is known is a piece of sharp practice that one might expect from the directors of a company that was in Queer-street. In their own interests as well as in the interests of the club I hope this decision will be reversed.

The Colonel is very angry about the attacks on Mr. Shipton, who is also the editor of the club's paper. Mr. Shipton is quite capable of looking after himself. I may mention that I was asked to give my permission to the publication of certain articles from Truth relating to the business of the club in the Gazette. I gave it, and I am told the necessary fifty signatures from members were affixed and the articles sent in. In breach of the resolution of the general meeting in 1902, they were not published. The Colonel's friends are as adept in the arts of gagging as they are in those of burking inquiry. I can only assure the Colonel that if he had defied the letter and spirit of the Queen's Regulations as he and his colleagues do those of the C.T.C. he would have been cashiered long ago. He considers the decline in the membership of the club is due to cycle touring going out of fashion, and not to any action of the council, that the action of the Reform party is doing great harm, and that unless the postal vote backs up the council the club will receive its death blow. What an admission to make! Unless the council, which could have nominated its own committee of inquiry, can get a reprieve for six months the club will die! What must be the real condition of a club that so dreads an inquiry into its finances and management as to fear death?

That is, I suppose, the reason why the books are not produced. That is the reason why the tremendous expense on postage is not gone into. In 1905, exclusive of the cost of the postage of the Gazette and Handbook and Farmhouse List, £754 14s. 9d. was spent. That is to say, the average for every working day was 590 penny letters, or a total of 181,127 penny letters a year. And this expenditure is not worth inquiry? He says to object to the £500 or £600 spent on councillors' fares is shabby. There are sixty of them. If he is right in his statement of the expenses the accounts are wrong. I consider the money absolutely wasted. A company with the capital and income of the C.T.C. is a business proposition, and must be managed from headquarters. There should be six directors appointed, with an annual fee of £25 each if they attended. They should meet quarterly. A strong finance board should be appointed to meet monthly—say, three members with additional fees. A finance committee that meets only three times a year, and only once in London, is quite unable to control the business at headquarters. This trotting about of the council I consider one of the worst features of the club. It lends itself to waste.

Now I come to a personal matter and I quote the Colonel; "Every one who knows Mr. Kendall Burnett knows that he is the most strict and high-principled man living, and anything he stated in his affidavit, referred to in your issue of March 27, he believed. I should like to find any one who has ever been on the council who would deny this statement. The slander, therefore, against him is all the more blackguardly." I quite accept all the attributes the Colonel gives to Mr. Kendall Burnett, the chairman. I have never heard it said that even the biassed Reformers speak in any other way of him. The only wonder is the attitude he has adopted in this matter. No man who desires to retain such a reputation should be a party to the refusal of the books to the committee of inquiry, or have permitted the statement to go unchallenged that the council welcomed inquiry by an unbiassed committe, when the council might have nominated its own committee. Unless the chairman desires to forfeit the respect of his fellow-members he must resign. The postal vote will not whitewash acquiescence in such conduct. I know not what to think of a chairman who is responsible for the employment of a clerk who assaults a member and does not apologise and is fined, and whose vice-chairman boasts that he is responsible for the line of action adopted at the trial. The chairman can believe what he likes. He swore that cycling was now dangerous on main roads because of motorists. The suggestion was that motoring was frightening cyclists. I know cycling is often disagreeable, but it is not dangerous. The danger was when there were no fore and aft rim brakes, and every horse driver tried to annoy cyclists. The chairman swears that the cost of legal aid to members is considerable. There is not a single item in the accounts for 1905 and 1906 allocated to legal aid to members. The only item is legal and Parliamentary expenses incurred on behalf of members and cyclists generally. The suggestion was that specific aid was given to individual members. In 1905 the legal and Parliamentary expenses item was £362 4s. 4d., and in 1906 £97 0s. 7d. not very large sums in a club with an income of £10,000 a year.

Men of the highest integrity and profoundest learning are often children in business matters. I do not cast any reflections on Mr. Kendall Burnett's integrity, but only on his business capacities. In conclusion, I regret that a retired officer of his Majesty's army is so blind to what is due to his position as to continue to serve on a council whose conduct after such a vote of censure would be a scandal if pursued by the directors of any business company in the United Kingdom.

INACTIVE STOCK MARKETS—SOME CAUSES OF THE PRESENT DULNESS—THE COMPETITION OF NEW ISSUES—BIG TRADE REQUIREMENTS—THE DISTRIBUTION OF DERELICT STOCK—THE SITUATION GRADUALLY RIGHTING ITSELF.

APART from a little animation in one or two individual shares, the amount of business transacted in the Stock Markets last week was again disappointingly small. On the face of it, the public appeared to be doing nothing either of an investment or speculative character. That the speculative spirit is dormant there is no room for doubt, in view of the disclosures made at recent Settlements, but it is probable that the investment appetite is larger than many people are aware of. Lately, it is true, the Stock Exchange has derived small enough benefit, but that is due largely to the fact that people have been subscribing for new issues, and thus avoiding toll in the shape of brokers' commissions. The average man dearly loves to think he is doing business on "wholesale" terms, and apart from the question of middleman's profit, there is no getting away from the admission that in the issues that have recently been offered to the public some unusual bargains have been obtainable. The Indian Government loan advertised at the end of last week is the latest case in point. The new scrip, which amounts to £3,500,000, took the form of 3½ per cent. stock at 98½, with a slight turn to the subscriber in the fact that a full quarter's interest will be paid on July 5, whereas the loan may be paid up by instalments spread over the next three months. While, however, allowing that a fairly large business in securities has lately been going on behind the back, as it were, of the Stock Exchange, it cannot be said to fully explain the dulness ruling in the House. The activity of trade throughout the country probably has much to answer for in keeping brokers and jobbers idle, for all past experience goes to show that boom times in trade are by no means boom times in the Stock Exchange. Merchants and manufacturers need to devote all their attention and surplus funds to the development of their own businesses, and the Stock Exchange for the time being must take second place. It is when trade slackens that the security market begins to reap the benefit. Money that has been locked up in industrial and commercial enterprise then gradually comes out, to find employment in other channels, and the result is ease in the money market and a general rise in investment stocks.

In addition to the two factors I have touched upon as explaining the slackness now prevalent in the stock markets, a third may be added in the shape of the derelict stock that has been on the market since the semi-panic times of March. Perhaps those who have grown impatient over the leaden aspect of the Stock Markets have not made enough allowance for the bad legacy left by the troubles of six weeks ago. Those troubles, it is true, did not cause the financial earthquakes that were predicted by outsiders, but they, nevertheless, involved some very heavy shifting of stocks, and those houses that "took over" securities from people in temporary difficulty have no doubt been doing a quiet amount of distribution in recent weeks. Altogether, then, a little reflection suggests that the time has not yet come for the House to despair. The new issues are, it is true, a nuisance from the House man's point of view, but the pace set lately cannot be kept up much longer. The recent rush was, perhaps, inevitable, bearing in mind that during the first quarter of the year the placing of gilt-edged stock was altogether barred by a prohibitive Bank rate, and that, consequently, the number of public borrowers on the waiting list had accumulated. The big requirements of trade are still a handicap, but as the country, from an industrial point of view, has already had several fat years, it is possible that before long there will be some reaction to quieter times. Already there are slight indications that industrial expansion has about reached the zenith, and though these come principally from the United States, they have a direct bearing upon the situation at home. Money, at any rate, has taken a distinct step towards becoming cheap, and it is not unlikely that the present 4 per cent. Bank rate may give place to a lower standard in the course of a few weeks. Easier money will in turn materially assist those who have wreckage seeking a haven, and thus the way looks like being paved, slowly but none the less surely, for brighter markets.

Home Rails on the Shelf—The Market Sagging From Want of Business—Merits Ignored—Scotch Preferred Issues a Bright Exception.

In the Home Railway market business during the week has remained virtually at a standstill, and prices have fallen, as the dealers say, from their own weight. The record may be gathered from the following table:—

The Scotch preferred stocks, the cheapness of which I called attention to in an article on Railway Fixed Interest Securities that appeared on April 17, have again been sought after by investors, and the prices have since then put on about three points. But the strength here only serves to give prominence to the backboneless condition of the market as a whole. There was talk last week of a further rise in the price of coal, and this was given as one of the reasons for a backward movement in prices. It would be easy, however, to pay too much attention to the alleged adverse factors for the Railway market at the present juncture; were the market not so entirely shunned by the public, the points that lately have done duty to explain declines would disappear, for they are little better than lame excuses. Home Rails have, in fact, been doing little else but fall for the past two years, although the general dividend position during that period has been steadily improving. Dearer coal was one of the things reckoned with at the beginning of the current year, but as regards most of the companies, traffics have lately been on such a grandiose scale that the probability of a somewhat higher expense ratio has no terrors. There is indeed, with the exception of one or two companies, no doubt about the maintenance of dividends, and several, among which the Great Northern and Hull and Barnsley stand out most prominently, should be able to increase their distributions. For the present, however, it is like flogging a dead horse to expatiate upon the merits of Home Rails, and apparently the market will have to possess its soul in patience, and hope that the advent of still cheaper money and the approach of the dividend season may give some stimulus to business in this department.

Union Pacifics Buoyant—Persistent Rumour About a Holding Company for the Union's Investments—Yankees Generally Quiet—Crops and Railroad Earnings—Atchison Bond Issue—Steel Trust Dividend.

The widespread attention given to Pacific Railroad issues served to awaken the American market last week from its recent spell of somnolence. Unions especially have been extensively bought on a reiteration of the rumours about the formation of a holding company to relieve the Union Pacific of its investments in the Southern Pacific and other railroads, with the avowed object of getting round the law should the Inter-State Commerce Commission rule that the Union Pacific's retention of these securities is illegal. The story is declared by some authorities to be without foundation, while others think it unlikely after the experience of the ill-fated Northern Securities Corporation. Whether, however, the Courts would regard the relation of the Union Pacific to the Southern Pacific in the same light as that of the Northern Pacific to the Great Northern may be doubted, because whereas the two latter roads are distinctly competitive, the two former only parallel each other at such great distances that their spheres of influence in the main are quite distinct. From the persistence with which the report of a holding company has been circulated it would be rash to assert that it is merely a "bull" canard; some people declare that the whole scheme is cut-and-dried, but that it will only be put into execution should the Inter-State Commerce Commission assume an antagonistic attitude towards the Union Pacific Company as now constituted. Meanwhile the market remains in an expectant mood, believing that any division of the Company's investments from its railroad assets by the issue of new bonus stock to represent the former would show up the present price of Unions in a favourable light. Of course, nothing must be taken for granted, but the possibility of "melon cutting" is likely to keep Unions on the move for some little time to come. Union Pacific preferred has shared in the rise with the ordinary on the theory that the two stocks would participate equally in any distribution of bonus stock.

Apart from Pacific issues, there were few features of individual interest in the market last week. Reading Common, from time to time, was taken in hand, the old belief in the coming separation of the company's railroad from its mineral assets being stimulated by the Government agitation against Trusts. Norfolk derived some benefit from expectations of increased business resulting from the Jamestown Tercentennial Exhibition. But the two factors that have operated most generally were the crop advices and the revenue statements, and these have largely served to offset the stimulating effect of the speculation in Unions. The movements in detail may be gathered from the following table:—

As regards crops, last week's Government report confirmed the recent reports of damage by cold, abnormal weather being reported in the grain area between the Mississippi River and the Rocky Mountains. There is little doubt that winter wheat has suffered considerably, and the strength of the Chicago grain market is an indication that the outlook is not regarded as particularly cheerful. Of course, any deficiency in the early crop may be made up by an increase in the amount of spring sown wheat—which is now being planted—while as regards the total cereal production the most important crop of all, that of maize, may turn the scale in the right direction. All the same, the year, from an agricultural point of view, has opened badly, and the point is of the more importance seeing that general trading conditions in the States are on the turn.

Traffic statements last week on the whole had an unsettling effect. The New York Central's showing was frankly bad, and afforded fresh evidence, if that were needed, of the unwisdom shown by the management in increasing the dividend last year. For the first quarter of the current twelvemonth gross earnings amounted to $21,778,000, an increase of $497,000, while net earnings were $3,586,000, a decrease of no less than $2,259,000. This means that the ratio of operating expenses rose 9 per cent. as compared with the March quarter of 1906. The Union Pacific, during March, managed to save $151,000 in net out of a gross increase of over a million dollars, but the Southern Pacific, while showing a gross gain of $1,116,000, reported a shrinkage in net of $569,000. The Chesapeake converted a gross increase of $104,000 into a net decrease of $29,000, while the Southern continues to wallow, net earnings for the month showing a falling off of $498,000. The actual net revenue for the month was no more than $813,000—left out of a total gross take of $5,014,000. Atchison have not been materially affected by the announcement of a new issue of 5 per cent. ten year convertible bonds to a total of $25,000,000, which have been offered to the stockholders to the extent of 12 per cent. of their holdings as registered on May 10. The issue forms part of a total of $98,000,000 recently created, and the money is required for equipment and extensions. English holders of the company's stock may subscribe through Messrs. Baring Bros. and Company, Limited, 8, Bishopsgate-street Within. The terms seem attractive enough, though the company may perhaps be congratulated on being able to place 5 per cent. bonds at this juncture, seeing that quite recently some of the largest American roads have had to issue short term bills bearing distinctly higher rates of interest, because the issue of bonds on anything like reasonable terms was impracticable. Payment for the new scrip is spread over a full twelvemonth. From a general standpoint the Atchison's action is not relished, as the market fears that the issue will be the forerunner of others of a similar character, and already the financial houses in New York, as I demonstrated by figures a week ago, have more scrip on their hands than they can conveniently take care of.

In accordance with the belief of all but the ultra-sanguine, the United States Steel Corporation has made no change in its quarterly rate of dividend, which remains at 2 per cent. per annum. The statement was undoubtedly a very fine one, the earnings for the quarter totalling $39,122,000, as against $36,634,000 for the corresponding period of 1906, $23,026,000 for the same period of 1905, $13,445,000 for the first quarter of 1904 (the record lean year), and $41,745,000 for the December quarter of 1906—which so far is the high record. The surplus after payment of the dividend works out at $18,185,000, or a decrease of $639,000 against that of December last. As foreshadowed by the annual report recently issued, the unfilled orders on hand have lately shown a falling off, the present total being 8,044,000 tons, as compared with 8,490,000 tons at the close of last year. As the decline in fresh contracts is likely to become more accentuated later on, in view of the slowing down of construction work in the United States, there is no likelihood of higher dividends in the common stock for some time to come. This robs the junior issue of attractiveness, though in view of the big margin behind the fixed charges the Five per Cent. Second Mortgage bonds, which stand slightly under par, and the Seven per Cent. Cumulative Preferred, which offers a yield of £6 17s. 6d., look worth the investor's attention. The first-named are a high-class investment, and in spite of the prejudice felt by many people against American Industrials, I have for some time wondered why the bonds have been allowed to remain so long around their present figure. The Preferred stands in the semi-speculative category, but a yield of 6⅞ is not to be lightly refused, and the shares might be worth picking up for mixing purposes.

CANADIAN PACIFIC MARCH STATEMENT—A RETURN TO NORMAL WORKING CONDITIONS—GRAND TRUNK EARNINGS—EXPLANATION OF THE CONTINUED HIGH EXPENSE RATIO—THE BRIGHT OUTLOOK FOR THIRDS—MEXICAN RAILS AND THE MEETING—REASSURING NEWS.

Although the trouble on the Alberta coalfield (now understood to be over) continued last week to check "bullish" activity in Canadian Pacific, the shares on balance made a modest improvement, thanks in a measure to the revenue statement for March. It may be remembered that, as a consequence of the severe weather, which reduced gross receipts while adding considerably to the expense ratio, the line during January and February reported decreased earnings of respectively $719,000 and $584,000. The March statement shows that, with an increase in gross earnings of $1,040,000, net takings advanced by $401,000, which comes on top of an increase of $662,000 a year ago. The proportion of expenses to receipts was 63.38, or a trifle less than in March, 1906, and compares against 87 and 88 in January and February of the present year. On the nine months the aggregate net earnings have increased by $1,497,000—equal to 9 per cent. Now that normal weather has again returned—and it is worth noting that navigation on the Upper Lakes was finally opened about a week ago—the Canadian Pacific is going ahead at a faster rate than ever, and with no doubt about the maintenance of the dividend—even if a higher payment from railway earnings be unlikely in the early future—holders of the shares are likely to rest satisfied with their investment, and await with patience the action that sooner or later will be taken in regard to the company's huge land assets, which alone are estimated to be worth from 15 to 20 millions sterling, whereas the entire common stock of the company is only about 24 millions sterling.

After the substantial improvement of a week ago Grand Trunk issues have eased off slightly on eagerness to secure profits, but the reaction is not likely to be more than a temporary one, having regard to the splendid earnings of this system. The March statement, showing that of a gross increase of £62,400 only £9,600 was saved as extra net revenue, was, perhaps, nothing to boast about, but the Trunk market has been accustomed for some time to see the bulk of the company's additional gross takings absorbed by extra working costs, and the figures, therefore, did not come as a disappointment. Even £9,600 saved out of £62,400 is an improvement upon £3,400 saved out of £99,500—which was the outcome of operations during January and February—and the position as regards the relation of net to gross increases should be further bettered during the next three months, as the ratio of expenses invariably declines in the second quarter of the year. The fact that out of a gain in gross revenue of £161,900 during the first three months only £13,000 has gone to swell net receipts, while not relished by those who have bought Trunks for an early "turn," may be used as a "bull" argument by those who hold the company's securities as investments. The fact is that the Trunk management, pursuing the policy adopted for some years past, is taking advantage of the present spell of prosperity to raise the physical standard of its property. With the traffic required to be handled growing every year at such an enormous pace, this conservative policy requires no justification, and while the greatest benefits from it lie in the future, the company is already deriving big advantages from the high credit which it enjoys, and the consequently low rates at which it can raise funds. At the moment the chief drag upon the Grand Trunk is its most recently acquired branch, the Canada Atlantic. Doubtless one day this will prove its worth as a feeder to the main system, but for the present, owing to the need of practically relaying the track, the line is not paying its way, there being a debit balance on the past three months of £4,600. Still, after making due allowance for the large proportion of earnings that will continue to be put back into the road, there is no reason to take aught but a bright view of the dividend outlook, so far as the immediate, as well as the more distant, future is concerned. Last year Trunk Third preference got 3 per cent. To pay another 1 per cent. calls for £72,000. Towards this £13,000 has already been contributed, as a result of three months' working, while there must be included a sum of £46,000 which the company has in hand on account of the non-repetition of last year's item, Michigan taxation arrears. Thus £59,000 out of the £72,000 is already available, leaving only £13,000 (plus a small sum as extra guaranteed interest) to be provided during the remaining nine months. Thirds should, therefore, in respect of 1907, get the full 4 per cent. to which they are entitled, with a fair margin to spare, and as the stock on the basis of a 4 per cent. dividend would give a yield of over 5½ per cent. to a present purchaser, it ought to be good for a rise of, say, ten points in the course of the current year.

In the Foreign Railway Market there was plenty of excitement last week in the Mexican Railway section in connection with the meeting held on Thursday last. Stockholders naturally turned up in force to hear how the company proposed to meet the £300,000 which the report had announced would be required from revenue for the purpose of bridge renewals and the relaying of a portion of the road. From the Chairman's speech it appears that the total expenditure upon physical improvements estimated to be spent within the next few years is as much as £630,000, divided as follows: New rails £200,000, sleepers £200,000, bridges £75,000, engines £70,000, cars £70,000, and sundries £15,000. This is enough to take the stockholder's breath away, but Mr. Pryor showed that so far as extra burden upon revenue was concerned the total amount proposed to be taken was at the outside £80,000, divided into eight half-yearly instalments of £10,000. The remainder of the large total would be derived by the sale of investments £116,000, sale of Vera Cruz terminals, and the compensation in respect of loss of business there, £146,000; realisation of old rails, £130,000; and as to the rest, by a continuance of the special appropriations from revenue that have been a feature of Mexican Railway finance for several half-years past. All this is exceedingly satisfactory, for it means that at the end of four years the company will have an up-to-date system, capable of properly coping with the heavier traffic that it is now being called upon to handle, and that the change will have been effected without adding to capital account, and with only a moderate increase in charges out of current revenue. But it makes it still harder to understand why the Board should have gone out of its way to alarm the shareholders with its cryptic reference to fresh revenue expenditure of £300,000, and I was not surprised that the meeting was productive of some heated comments from some of the proprietors. It would have done less harm had the report contained no reference at all to the matter of new special expenditure, and had the Chairman reserved the full explanation for the meeting. But obviously the duty of the Board, if it alluded to the subject, was to have set forth the position clearly, and not in so ambiguous a manner as to frighten shareholders into throwing away their stocks. So far as the outlook is concerned, the new charge of £20,000 per annum need not necessarily entail a cutting down of the dividend on the Second Preference, for already in respect of a third of the year the company shows an increase in gross receipts of about £36,000. But the market will now probably give up talking for a time about dividends on the ordinary. My usual table follows:—

See-Saw Tendency in the Kaffir Market—Business Still on a Small Scale, Awaiting a Definite Statement Regarding Labour—General Botha's Assurances—Results and Prospects of Ferreira and Robinson.

Business in the Kaffir Market has remained quiet. During the past week prices have been mainly influenced by the operations on behalf of French speculators, and on balance show no material change. There does not seem much to go for speculatively in this market at the moment, the quietness being expected to continue in evidence pending a definite statement as to what is to be done in regard to the Chinese whose contracts expire in the next few months. The hope that General Botha would see his way to make an announcement on this matter at the banquet last Wednesday was not fulfilled. He said he was not in a position to make a detailed statement, but hoped soon to be able to do so. The market, however, was temporarily cheered by the fact that the Transvaal Premier renewed the assurances he made before and directly after the elections that his party desired to do justice by the mining industry. "My Government," he remarked, "will use its best endeavours to make the mining industry the success of the Transvaal, and a great success at that, because I know the prosperity and progress and the welfare, not only of the Transvaal, but of the whole of South Africa, are materially dependent upon the development of that industry." And, in concluding his speech, General Botha said: "I can assure you we shall do nothing [in regard to the labour question] without having instituted a drastic inquiry." This allusion to the Commissions the Government has appointed to inquire into the various phases of the labour problem serves as a reminder that the Premier is not likely to be in a position to make a definite statement on the question until their reports have been drawn up and considered. The question is: Will a decision be arrived at before the expiry of the contracts of the first coolies to arrive on the Rand three years ago? It certainly seems doubtful, and, in the event of their having to be repatriated—as they will have to be unless the Government takes action and so makes it possible for them to be re-engaged—the first mine to suffer will be the New Comet. It would appear that the hopes of the new Government are that, by taking the control of the native labour recruiting into its own hands, it will be able to ensure a better supply, and thus supplant the Chinese; but, as I have pointed out before, the leaders of the mining industry are not likely to be satisfied with an equal number of natives in the place of the Chinese. The latter class of labour is superior to native labour by reason of its continuity, and those in a position to express an opinion on the matter consider that to replace a given number of Chinese the industry would require two or three times that number of natives. This is a point, however, which the Commissions will doubtless consider and report upon, and those interested as shareholders must needs continue to exercise patience. In face of the Transvaal Premier's repeated assurances, it is difficult to conceive of the interests of Rand shareholders being allowed to suffer. The gold production of the Transvaal is an important factor in connection with British commerce as a whole, and serious interference with the operations of the mines would concern many besides holders of Kaffir shares. This is, to a certain extent, a safeguard, and it seems to me that, at the worst, any action taken by the Government would be of a character least likely to affect the principal mines steadily producing the precious metal.

The annual reports have just reached me of two Rand mines which were among the earliest contributors to the Transvaal gold output, and whose returns are to-day at or near the top of the list. I refer to the Ferreira and the Robinson. Their properties adjoin, and both have remarkable records in respect of dividends distributed. The Robinson started with the modest capital of £50,000, but this has since been increased to £2,750,000, whereas the Ferreira's capital is £95,000. Last year Ferreira earned a profit of £351,114, as compared with £313,554 in 1905, while interest and other revenues increased the totals to £363,168 and £324,917 respectively. The past year was, in fact, a record one in the history of the company, both in regard to the profit realised and the sum distributed amongst shareholders, the dividends in respect of the past twelve months being equivalent to 300 per cent. This represents a yield of over 15 per cent. on the current price of the shares, and it is worthy of note that the monthly profits so far for the current year have been above the average of last year. The reason for the shares not being valued at a higher price in the market is doubtless the fact that the remaining life of the mine at the present rate of working is unlikely to be long. But as the chairman pointed out at the recent meeting, though the seeming life of the mine is limited to, say, six or seven years at the present high pressure, shareholders can reasonably look forward to quite a respectable period of work after that with profits on a smaller scale. An interesting point in respect of this mine is that it is a favourite with the natives. The Robinson's working profit amounted to £632,382 in 1906, as against £547,236 for the preceding year, and in the case of this mine also I believe the past year's results constitute a record in its history. Sundry revenue in 1906 was £20,383, compared with £7,427 in 1905, and the dividends declared were equivalent to 20 per cent., as against 17 per cent. On the current market price, the yield on the basis of the 1906 dividends works out at nearly 12 per cent. In the current year, however, the monthly profits have averaged £60,000, as compared with the average of £52,700 in 1906, and the management has confidence that, provided the labour supply is not interfered with, this rate of profit can be maintained. It is calculated that the Robinson has about nine years remaining life in respect of the contents of the two rich reefs, while in addition, like the Ferreira, it may be expected at the end of that period to derive profits from working the low-grade ore. The annual reports of the New Primrose, New Rietfontein, and Glencairn companies are also just to hand, and will be found in another portion of this issue. I propose to deal with these and the other mines of the Barnato group in an early issue.

In diamond shares there has been a fair amount of business transacted during the past week, chief attention having been paid to De Beers and New Vaal Rivers, as the following table of prices indicates:—

Share.	April 27, 1907.	May 4, 1907.	Rise or Fall.
De Beers Pref.	18	18⅜	+ ⅜
" " Def.	26	26⅞	+ ⅞

" Def.	9⅛	9 11/16	—
New Vaal River	6 9/16	5¼	- 1⅜
Premier (Transvaal) Pref.	8½	8½	—
" " Def.	12⅞	12⅞	—

New Vaals have quieted down somewhat, but it is quite on the cards that activity will be resumed at any moment, as it is rumoured that there are two cliques at work, each desirous of obtaining the control of the undertaking. But the shares are not a suitable medium for the speculator who is not in a position to face the possibility of a pretty big loss, as the recent violent fluctuations in the quotation have demonstrated. Premier Diamonds have been comparatively idle of late. An announcement is made by this company which shareholders are hardly likely to appreciate, it being to the effect that in future returns will only be published half-yearly, "in accordance with the agreement between the company and the Government." Why the Government (which, by the way, is interested in the mine to the extent of six-tenths of the profits earned) should require this is not at all clear, and it would be interesting to have an explanation.

In the Rhodesian section the activity which sprang up at the beginning of the past week in Eldorados and the other shares of the Banket group quickly subsided, and prices gave way slightly, but it is rumoured that this group is to be taken in hand again by parties interested. In the event of the prediction being fulfilled and a moderate advance in prices being scored, it is not improbable some holders will be tempted to realise, and I do not think the improvement likely to be long maintained, though the approach of the time for the commencement of crushing at the Eldorado may be made the most of to stimulate speculative interest.

Speculative Interest in the Westralian Market Centred Mainly Upon Associated—Disappointment Causes a Sharp Relapse—Cosmopolitan's Cornish Interest—The News From Loddon Valley.

Business has not been very brisk in the Westralian market during the past week, but there has been some further "investment" inquiry for the shares of leading dividend-paying mines, notably Kalgurlis, Ivanhoes, and Sons of Gwalia. The prospects of the last-mentioned I commented upon last week. The present price, ex dividend, for Ivanhoes, is almost the equivalent of £8 cum dividend, which represents an appreciation of nearly £1 per share in the last month or so, but even at that figure I do not think the shares can be considered over-valued, having regard to the strength of the company's position, and the fact that last year's dividends represent a yield of 15 per cent. on that price. Speculative activity in this market has continued to be chiefly displayed by Associated, and it will be seen from the subjoined table that a relapse has followed the recent substantial recovery in the price of the shares:—

The further news to hand by cable during the past week as to the developments in the Associated mine disappointed speculators, and they hastened to secure their profits; but it does not follow, of course, that there is now no chance of proving the continuation of the famous Iron Duke chute in this company's ground. Among the small-priced Westralian shares, Cosmopolitans have received attention in view of the official announcement that the company has, with the Hannan's Proprietary, secured a Cornish tin property. The mine is known as the Phœnix United, and is situated near Liskeard. In the past the property was a large producer, but had to shut down in 1897 because of the low price ruling for tin and the antiquated methods then in use which rendered profitable mining impossible. With modern methods, and the good price for the metal now ruling, it is thought that handsome profits may be expected. The mine has been secured under lease direct from the Duchy of Cornwall, and no time has been lost in arranging for its exploitation; plans and specifications for the necessary plant for its unwatering have been prepared, and a large portion of the machinery ordered. The amount to be provided for the development and equipment of the property by the two companies interested is £75,000. This acquisition adds to the speculative attractions of "Cosmops," which, I think, are a promising purchase at the current price, having regard to the extent of the company's cash resources and the possibility of developments again improving in its Westralian mine.

The recovery in the Deep Leads group has been checked by the receipt of a cable from the Loddon Valley containing the news that it will be impossible for a week or so to continue the cross-cuts into the lead itself from the 454-ft. level, owing to a sand rush, gas, and water. An encouraging feature, however, is that the message also reports average assays of the wash at three points, and two of the values are of payable grade, assuming the anticipated cost of working on a large scale to be correct.

Copper Group Continues Active—Statistics Favour the Bulls—Tintos Fulfil Market's Prediction—Great Cobar Dividend Rumours—Broken Hills Quiet—The Waihi Position—Cobalt Introductions—Indian Gold Output.

The Copper group has continued the most active section of the Mining markets, though on the whole there has not been quite so much doing in some shares of this class during the past week as there was in the preceding period. The older favourites have again been largely dealt in, especially Tintos, which, it will be seen, show a further appreciable gain on the week:—

On Monday Tintos were run up to over 97, and, allowing for the dividend of £3 per share, have thus touched the 100 mark to which they were predicted to recover. The copper statistics published last week favoured the "bulls," showing a reduction of 572 tons in stocks and 822 tons in visible supplies during the preceding fortnight, while for the month a decline was exhibited of 1,299 tons in stocks and 2,049 tons in supplies. The publication of these figures caused a sharp rise in the price of the metal, but there has since been a relapse from the best. The Australian copper descriptions have been somewhat quieter, and in some cases quotations have drooped, but with a continuance of a good price for the metal fresh buyers for the shares will doubtless come along. Great Cobars have given way, but have since recovered part of the ground lost. Interest in these shares, as well as in Mount Lyells, has latterly been stimulated by dividend anticipations. On Great Cobars it has been predicted in the market that a distribution of £1 per share might be expected next month, but the latest rumour is to the effect that a dividend is not to be looked for until about the end of the year. One of the latest introductions in this section of the markets is the Queensland Copper Freeholds, a report of whose statutory meeting will be found elsewhere in this issue.

There has not been a great deal doing in Broken Hill shares during the past week, though Zincs have continued to attract a fair amount of attention. The recovery in Zincs has made a little progress, thanks chiefly to "bear" covering, part of which is attributed to Colonial speculators. The management has issued a further cable, giving the results of a week's run with the one unit of plant that has been adapted to the Cattermole process. It is to be hoped that such information will be regularly supplied in future, and that as soon as possible an official statement as to working costs will be issued.

The annual meeting of the Waihi Gold Mining Company, New Zealand's premier gold producer, is to be held to-morrow, and judging from the nature of the report for the past year shareholders are likely to be in a good humour. The gross profit of £502,073 for 1906 compares with £416,593 for 1905, and in addition to quarterly dividends of 3s. per share, holders are receiving a bonus of like amount, bringing the full return for the past year up to 15s. per share, or 75 per cent., as against 65 per cent. for 1905. To reserve £10,000 is being added, making the total under this head £130,000, and after these appropriations a sum of £18,175 remains to be carried forward. The company is also in a satisfactory position as regards the ore reserves opened up in its mine; at the end of 1906 they were estimated at 1,029,658 tons, an increase of nearly 100,000 tons on the previous year's figures, and equivalent to over three year's supply on the basis of the tonnage dealt with in the past twelve months. As regards the developments, the position is summed up by the directors in a sentence to the effect that on the whole they "seem to point to a long continuance of the prosperity of the company." While, however, the position is strong and the outlook promising, it seems to me that Waihis are quite high enough at 9¼, the yield on this price being only about 8 per cent., which is not a large return on a mining share.

The past week has witnessed the introduction on the market of the shares of one or two companies formed to exploit property in the Cobalt-mining district of Canada. So far little speculative interest has been taken on this side in this new field, but in some quarters the opinion is now held that there is likely to be an active market in a number of Cobalt stocks in London before very long. One of the companies just brought to the notice of British investors bears the title of "England's Premier Cobalt Mining Company, Limited," but I see that it is incorporated in Toronto, and its head office is in that city. The capital is £220,000 in £1 shares, of which only 20,000 shares represent the working capital, so that apparently the remaining 200,000 have gone to the vendors. I am left to make this assumption as the printed particulars issued do not contain a definite statement as to the purchase price.

The gold production of the Indian mines for April was only 86 oz. less than the output for March, despite the shorter month, but it was a thousand ounces below the return for the corresponding month last year:—

YANKEE OPERATORS IN THE BRITISH GOLDFIELD.

There is a British goldfield in which ingenious Yankees have struck an infinitely richer ore than any the Chastan Syndicate is ever likely to discover in the Forest of Dean. The auriferous deposits are found in the pockets (or the stockings) of small investors, and for their extraction the most necessary equipment is a certain degree of proficiency in the art of flapdoodling. Conspicuous among the practitioners of this art are A. L. Wisner and Co., "bankers," of New York, who when I last had occasion to refer to them were kindly giving people over here the inestimable privilege of acquiring the one dollar shares of a Californian mining company, combining "perfect safety with large certain profits," at the ridiculously low price of fifteen cents each. From Finsbury-pavement House, E.C., these American financial magnates—potential customers are led to understand that they are a very big firm—are now sending out batches of long-winded circulars—one being in the guise of the Investment Herald—on the subject of what they are pleased to describe as "an unprecedented offer." It is represented that they have in hand a scheme for the consolidation of four "excellent enterprises"—two gold mine and two oil companies—into the Amalgamated Mining and Oil Company, "organised under the laws of the territory of Arizona." One of these enterprises is the Murchie Gold Mines, and the present combined profit-earning capacity of the four companies is sufficient—so A. L. Wisner and Co. assert—to pay a six per cent. dividend immediately. The scheme provides that each holder of shares in the Murchie Company shall receive in exchange not only an equal number of shares in the Amalgamated, but the same amount over again in gold bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest, and redeemable "at par, with 5 per cent. added, at any time after five years from date of issue." Therefore, it is pointed out, the holder of Murchies will "at once have a yield of 12 per cent."; by the redemption of the gold bonds of the Amalgamated—securities, by the way, of a class on which "almost any bank is ready at any time to loan money"!—he will get back his capital in full with a profit "after five years"; and even then he will still retain "as so much additional clear profit" the shares, "whose dividend-paying possibilities it would be hard to forecast or limit." Finally, as though all this were not enough to satisfy any reasonable man, A. L. Wisner and Co. "have guaranteed to protect the shareholders against loss at all times." Such is the statement on the strength of which this eminent banking house, following the well-known practice of eminent banking houses, is now touting Murchie shares among the British public at 4s. 2d. each. The British investor is, of course, expected to believe everything that he is told. It is evidently assumed that he will not pause to inquire why these wonderful bargains in mining shares have not been snapped up in America, or even to ask who guarantees the guarantors.

For a great many of the dupes of the Yankee share-pushers one can feel but little sympathy. They ought to know better. Not infrequently, however, I hear of cases which excite one's pity for the victims and indignation against the sharps into whose hands they have fallen. The other day a correspondent wrote to me on behalf of a poor old woman who had been gulled into putting £20 into "The Great Cariboo Gold Company," which was alleged to have phenomenally rich mines somewhere in British Columbia. The woman and her husband, both getting on for eighty years of age, have only £20 a year to live upon, but they scraped together £20 to invest in this venture, in the belief that it meant a certain big increase of their income. The address of the company was given as 1,135, Broadway, New York; "transfer agents, the Standard Finance Company," of the same address. Not receiving the anticipated dividends, the woman, after some months had elapsed, wrote to the office, and in reply she was informed that "operations in the mine had been delayed owing to the non-delivery of machinery." Another six months passed, and then she wrote again. This time the answer came from the manager of "The American Commercial Exchange," which also appears to be located at 1,135, Broadway, and the effect of it was that the Great Cariboo Company had encountered serious labour troubles at the mines, but that there were still "splendid prospects," so that no shareholder should be discouraged. Meanwhile, the woman was exhorted to take advantage of another "ideal investment" by buying some of the bonds of the American Commercial Exchange, which were "as safe as a bank." By way of proof the manager added:—

> In order that you may not be in doubt, I enclose sample bond for your inspection. You will note the bond pays 6 per cent. guaranteed interest, and returns one-tenth of the principal yearly; however, the 6 per cent. interest is paid on the full amount ($100) right along during the ten years. By this method you actually realise 18 per cent. yearly profit on the investment during the ten years.

The fact that a "sample bond" is used in this way to gull a poor ignorant old country-woman is a sufficient indication of the character of the parties calling themselves the American Commercial Exchange. As to the Great Cariboo Company, so far as can be ascertained here, it has no mines in British Columbia or anywhere else.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can I reply by post, and as there seems to be a misunderstanding in the minds of many of my readers, I wish to emphasise the fact that a coupon must be attached to every inquiry. A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the coloured cover of TRUTH.

2. Six different stocks are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks an additional coupon or coupons (one for every half-a-dozen stocks) must be forwarded. The answering of many of the inquiries I receive necessitates a great deal of careful research, and I shall therefore be compelled henceforth to enforce this regulation. Its necessity will be apparent when I state that some correspondents send lists of 20 or 30 different stocks covering every class and description of Investment.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

4. Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

5. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

6. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

7. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

8. I do not recommend brokers or solicitors.

RAILWAYS.

W. J. B.—They are a poor holding, and although the concern has been doing rather better lately, I am afraid the dividend prospects are still somewhat remote. You might, on the whole, employ your money to better advantage elsewhere.

MINES.

Adew.—I cannot say when the dividend will be increased, but ultimately distributions should be on such a scale as to represent a yield of fully 10 per cent. on the current price. See my notes in issue of February 27 last. I would hold the shares. D. K. M.—1. I do not think a reconstruction probable. 2. The shares dealt in are fully paid. 3. Shareholders might be given a chance to subscribe the capital, or some of the vendor shares might be distributed amongst them; but it is obviously impossible to make a definite statement at this juncture. 4. Hold in hope of a small profit. Aliquis.—Hopeful speculations for a rise in an active market. Nightshade.—You could do better than put more money into the Lydenburg shares, but the others might be averaged. Spontini.—I know nothing against the management. The enterprise is, of course, a speculative one, and, so far as I am aware, there is no market in the shares. Carter.—1. They are a fair speculation among low-priced mining shares. They are fully paid. 2. See reference to Cosmopolitans in my notes this week. Heidelberg.—1. I think you might average. You appear to have overlooked the fact that Sulphide Corporation Ordinary are of the nominal value of 15s., and there are Preference in front of them. 2-5. I should prefer Ivanhoes to any of these. They are less speculative, and give a good yield. Mac.—I am not aware that there is any fixed scale of commission; it is a matter of negotiation in each particular case. Primus.—1. The writer certainly seems to have got mixed up. 2. A further purchase would be a fair speculation, but you should not put too much money into one concern. 3. I have no reason to think it is not properly conducted. Haven.—I have not a good opinion of the prospects of the concern, but having joined the reconstruction you are legally liable for the remaining calls, and even forfeiture of your shares would not release you from the liability.

Mixed.

Olga.—1. Prospects are very speculative. 2. A hopeful holding. 3. There may be a recovery. 4. A fair speculation for a small profit. 5. I do not see much attraction in these at the current price. 6. They seem more likely to decline than advance. Lambert, Kilkenny.—The mining shares are very speculative selections, but should have some improvement when business becomes more brisk. Neither of the others is particularly attractive. Gag.—1. The company appears to be still in existence, but I have no recent information regarding its affairs. The shares are quoted about 1s. 2. For the present. Slump.—I should not buy any of them with a view to an early rise or certain dividends. G. G. P.—1. Your list is not a bad one, and by spreading the money as suggested the lady ought not to come to much harm. 2. Very little is known of this concern on this side, and I am unable to express an opinion. If you are in want of a likely 5 per cent. American bond, why not choose the Five per Cent. Second Mortgage bonds of the United States Steel Corporation? See this week's comments. Wulk.—1. Worth taking up. 2. Divide your money between Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds (first series), Grand Trunk Second Preference, and United States Steel Five per Cent. Second Mortgage bonds. Infelix.—1. So far as I am aware, no particular significance is to be attached to the movement. It is impossible to fix a price at which you ought to sell; my advice would be to keep such an eminently sound stock as an investment. 2. Yes. R. S.—Grand Trunk Railway Second Preference, San Paulo Railway Preference, Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds (first series), and Imperial Tobacco Five and a Half per Cent. Preference. Divide the money between the four. Ademic (India).—You could not obtain such a return as you suggest without taking a good deal of risk. I would not recommend you to try for more than about 5 per cent., and even then you cannot get, what may be called off-hand, "safe" securities. However, by spreading your money over the following half dozen, you ought to be able to command an income of rather more than £60 a year without seriously endangering your capital:—United States Steel Corporation Five per Cent. Second Mortgage bonds, Anglo-American Telegraph Preferred, Brazil Five per Cent. bonds (Western of Minas), Atchison Railroad Five per Cent. Preferred, Japanese Five per Cent. bonds, and Aerated Bread Ordinary. Matjiesfontein.—1. Give the preference to the 4½ per cent. bonds, which are specially secured on the Tobacco Monopoly. 2. The second issue of Fives was guaranteed as to principal and interest, while the bonds of 1897 are guaranteed as to interest only, and that not beyond 1919. I do not consider either, and particularly the latter, a desirable holding. 3. Wait. York.—1. Not very attractive. 2. These should be taken. 3. Will reply to this question next week. 4. You may as well hold in hope of some recovery. Legolium.—1. You could do better if you require 5 per cent. Nos. 3 and 4 may have some improvement in an active market, but I am afraid Nos. 2 and 5 are hopeless. 6. Interest is in arrears, and the shares appear hopeless. Depot.—1. A poor gamble. 2. A fair speculative investment. Gledhill.—The Borneo share is a fair lock-up, but Dumont Coffees are not attractive. A number of answers to correspondents under this heading are unavoidably held over till next week.

Miscellaneous.

Kismet.—I replied to your first inquiry on April 17. As to the mining shares, there is a fair chance of a recovery to about the price at which you purchased. A. P., Karshi.—1. The bank is regarded as safe, and the society is still in existence. 2. I have published innumerable warnings against the International Securities Syndicate. Do not buy such bonds, either from this or any other touting firm. Hull.—Have nothing to do with it. Ghel.—Not very attractive, especially in view of the report just out. Montana.—A number of people have successfully sued Cunliffe, Russell and Co. in Paris; the name of the solicitor has been forwarded. A. S. C., Gibraltar.—No; a common usury-shop, not a "bank." Ignotus.—A sound investment. G. E., Highbury.—I have not had occasion to criticise the firm; but see Rule 8 above. It is better to do business through a member of the Stock Exchange. G. D.—1. Read preceding reply. 2. It is certain that it is not philanthropy. I will try to find out something about the concern. J. S., Cardiff.—No doubt you saw my remarks last week about "Lawson and Co." The firm mentioned in the cutting is a different, but equally shady, one. Will.—Thanks. Verdant.—It would be much wiser to put your £50 into the Post Office Savings Bank; but, any way, have nothing to do with any system of so-called "investment" on a marginal basis. You would be almost certain to lose your money. Hope.—Do you not understand that you cannot gamble with your money without risking the loss of it. The probability is that you would lose it. Excel.—1. No; a cover-snatching bucket-shop. 2. I know nothing about it or the parties who give the guarantee. What is their guarantee worth? Rye.—It might be best to realise and put the proceeds into something with decent prospects. Sunderland.—The debentures are redeemable only at the option of the company on six months' notice, after 1910, at 115. They are the "premier" securities of this company, but that counts for nothing. Sell and put the proceeds into something hopeful. Verbena.—1. Let them drop. 2. Sell on any recovery in the market. 3. Safe investment. Chaplain.—1. They will probably recover further before long. 2. A fair holding. 3. Might be held. 4. Hopeless. I will look through the letters if you send them. B. W. E. and M.—Would not recommend you to average, but you might hold for a recovery in capital value following the reorganisation sanctioned. There is a possibility of a resumption of interest payments on the reduced preference capital. Gardenia.—I do not consider the outlook for the concern very hopeful. Use your own discretion. Perplexed.—Read preceding reply; thanks for the papers. Victim.—Laurie and Vincent. have already been "shown up." New Coal.—Do not take them. C. C. C.—Its prospects are very good. Parel.—I know nothing about them except that they are not members of the Stock Exchange. See Rule 8. Lancaster.—Much will depend upon to-day's meeting. Pater, Lisna, and other correspondents.—Your questions shall be answered next week.

Industrials—English Sewing Cotton Sensation—Motors Drooping—A Prosperous Margarine Company—Another Fright for Brewery Shareholders—Reaction in Allsopps.

In the Industrial Market the one small sensation of the week was the remarkable circular of the directors of the English Sewing-Cotton Company in reference to certain proposed alterations in the articles of association which are to be considered at an extraordinary meeting to-day (Wednesday). One of these alterations, if adopted, will give the board power to remove any director who in the opinion of three-fourths of his colleagues is acting injuriously to the interests of the company. There are some precedents for this, but it does not follow that it is a desirable arrangement—on the contrary, it is conceivable that circumstances might arise in the affairs of any company when this drastic power could be employed by a majority of the directors in their own interests rather than in the interests of the shareholders. Evidently friction has occurred among the directors of the English Sewing-Cotton Company, but whether there is good reason for the expulsion of any member of the board or not, the shareholders will do well to consider whether the necessary power ought not to be kept in their own hands. The circular intimates that a statement will be made in regard to various unauthorised rumours concerning the position and prospects of the company "and the recent manipulation of the shares on the Stock Exchange," as the directors think that the shareholders should be warned against the present speculation. The statement is awaited with a good deal of curiosity, for the recent advance in the shares seemed to be warranted by the company's position and the prosperous business it was believed to have been doing. As was inevitable, this disquieting circular caused an immediate sharp drop in the shares of seven or eight shillings. Other textiles have remained practically unchanged. In iron and steel companies issues there has been less activity than of late, and motor shares have also been slack, the movements recorded being generally towards a lower level. Argylls, Daimlers, Darracqs, and Dunlop ordinary have all suffered a slight relapse, which holders may, however, safely disregard as of no significance. Among the catering companies, both J. Lyons and Co. and the British Tea Table shares have had a modest gain, while Aerated Breads have declined. A satisfactory report is presented by the directors of Van den Berghs, Limited, the manufacturers of margarine. The raw materials employed in the production of this popular butter substitute were more costly during the past year, but the output was substantially increased, and the company is again able to pay a dividend of 16 per cent. on the ordinary shares, after adding £11,700 to the reserve, which now stands at £122,400, and leaving no less than £227,000 to be carried forward to the next account. At the current quotations the A and B preference shares of this company yield about 5¼ per cent., and both can be recommended as an industrial investment, while to any one inclined to take a little more risk, the ordinary shares, returning between 7 and 8 per cent., should be decidedly attractive.

The chairmen and officials of brewery companies certainly do their best to make their shareholders' flesh creep with dismal predictions respecting the effect of the alterations in the licensing laws which it is assumed that the Government intend to propose. Precisely what the alterations will be is not yet known, but neither their ignorance on the point nor the fact that the Licensing Bill is not to be proceeded with this session discourages these prophets of evil. Last week the secretary of Worthington and Co., in sending out the warrant for the half-year's dividend on the preference shares, exhorted the shareholders to use every effort to resist legislation, which "must have the effect of seriously depreciating the capital value of all brewery securities, and may even affect the power of directors to continue payment of dividends on their share capital, both preference and ordinary." This stupid circular, as was inevitable, scared a number of people into selling Worthington preference shares, and the result was an immediate depreciation of the capital value of those securities. Allsopp ordinary and preference have given way somewhat, but on balance remain higher than they did before the announcement of the changes in the management, to which reference was made last week. There are no signs of any revival of speculative interest in Anglo-American Telegraph Deferred, nor do Hudson Bays seem to be attracting much attention for the present.

QUEER STORY.

THE MARTYRDOM OF ST. AGNES.

COURTLEIGH LICKFOLD sat in the studio attached to his Bayswater residence, smoking the inevitable briar pipe, that was seldom absent from his lips, and applying desultory touches to a small canvas that stood on an easel by his side. He did not appear to be paying much attention to the job, nor, indeed, was he, his thoughts being entirely engrossed with other matters. Not the most agreeable matters, either, if one might judge by his puckered brow and general air of moodiness and worry. It was the old story with Courtleigh Lickfold—a woman and money. He was generally suffering from the one or the other of these fruitful sources of masculine trouble. Just now, as it happened, he was suffering from both.

The money part of the business was represented by various pressing liabilities, against which his only immediate asset was an exiguous balance at the bank. The woman was represented by Hilda Mountjoy.

He had certainly behaved badly to Hilda Mountjoy, as, sooner or later, Courtleigh Lickfold pretty generally did behave to any woman with whom he embarked on an affaire. Possibly, he could not help the fickle ardour and inveterate selfishness of his affections. Indeed, I really think it was constitutional with him and in the blood. But that did not make it any better for the women whose hearts he won by his ardent, and at the time genuine, love-making, but to whom he afterwards cooled and whom he ultimately cast aside. This was how he had treated Hilda Mountjoy.

Hilda, I should tell you, was a lady born; but she had been thrown on the world by the death of her parents, who had been unable to make any provision for her, and compelled to earn her own living—a meagre little living, too—as a teacher of music. The very fact of her being friendless and unprotected made Lickfold's conduct the more abominable. If she had had a father or brother to look after her, Lickfold would doubtless have been called upon to explain himself before the girl's affections were compromised, and would have had either to make a definite and honourable offer for Hilda's hand or else to cease his attentions. But she, gentle, trustful creature, never suspecting but that her lover was in earnest and meant marriage, surrendered her heart to him without demur. When, therefore, she found that he had only been amusing himself with her, the shock was more than her tender, sensitive heart could bear. It resulted in an attack of brain fever to which she succumbed.

Only that morning Courtleigh Lickfold had been apprised of her death by the landlady of her lodgings, who also brought him a pathetic little note, scribbled by the poor girl in pencil during her last brief moments of lucid consciousness, in which she assured him of her forgiveness for the wrong he had done her, and implored him never again to treat any other woman as he had treated her.

Unprincipled and selfish flirt though he was, this touching little letter, evidently written in his victim's heart's blood, aroused in Courtleigh Lickfold several unusually sharp twinges of remorse. He still had some conscience left and some sort of apology for a heart. Of course, he tried to excuse himself to himself. "After all, I stopped short of actual wrong. No real sin can be laid at my door. Why will women take these things so seriously?"

Why? . . . . Why will the sun shine? Why will the birds sing? Why will the fruit trees blossom? Why, when the clouds are full of rain, will they empty themselves upon the earth? . . . . Because their Creator has fashioned them so. Because God has made the loving heart of a pure woman at once the strongest and the tenderest thing in all the world. It is like the soft shoot of the young asparagus, that one breath of frost will blast and wither, and yet that can force its way upwards through asphalt or macadam.

But Courtleigh Lickfold understood none of these things. Himself merely skimming upon the outer surface of life, he was incapable of penetrating its inner realities. To play at love with a woman was excellent good fun while the novelty of it lasted. But it soon palled—if you played it too long with one woman. That the woman should not view matters in the same light struck him as unreasonable. That she should turn light comedy into heavy tragedy (as Hilda Mountjoy had done), and behave so absurdly as to sacrifice her life on the altar of his fickleness, thereby placing him in an undeservedly culpable position, seemed to him to constitute an act of downright injustice.

Why had she done this thing? Why had she, in effect, made him appear a heartless and unfeeling brute? No great harm in flirting with a pretty girl, after all. And yet, now that she was dead, there would be ridiculous persons, probably, who would stigmatise him as her murderer. He had seen a look indicative of that in the stern, reproving eyes of the landlady who had brought him Hilda's last letter. It was beastly annoying to be placed in such a position. In fact, he really tried to persuade himself that he was an aggrieved man.

But, all the same, the voice of conscience, though he thus made every effort to stifle it, still would make itself audible—the reproachful face of the dead girl would keep rising before him and coming between him and the work in which he was endeavouring to engross himself. No wonder the touches of his brush upon the canvas were fitful and desultory; no wonder his face was moody and troubled.

However, his uncomfortable thoughts were soon broken in upon by an enforced interruption—an interruption for which, just then, he was sincerely thankful. The door of his studio was hastily thrown open, and in, like a whirlwind, rushed his young friend and fellow-artist, Frank Lascelles.

"I say, Court.," exclaimed the young man, whose face denoted considerable agitation and excitement. "I'm in the deuce of a fix, and I've come to you to lend me a helping hand."

"What is it, young 'un?" inquired Courtleigh Lickfold. "Not money, I hope. For, if so——"

"No, it's not money," interposed Lascelles. "At least" (he corrected himself), "I do want money, and want it badly. But that's not what I've come to ask you for. The fact is this: I've got several judgments for debt out against me, and I'm expecting the bailiffs in at my place any minute. They're welcome to anything they can find there except one, and that's my picture—my magnum opus—which I've just finished for the Academy. I tell you, Court.," cried the enthusiastic young man, "I look to make my name and my fortune with that picture. And, come what may, these beastly bailiffs shan't take it in execution and dispose of it at some knock-out sale for an old song. So I want you, old man, to give it warehouse room here, until it's time to send it along to Burlington House."

"Certainly, my dear boy. With the greatest pleasure," answered Courtleigh Lickfold, always ready enough to oblige a friend where he could do so without personal inconvenience. "Send it round here whenever you like."

"Oh, I've got it on a cab outside now," answered Lascelles. "I didn't dare leave it behind, lest the bailiffs should be in before I got back. P'rhaps I may ask the cabbie to give me a hand in with it, at once—eh?"

"By all means," nodded Lickfold.

Lascelles lost no time in acting on this permission. And the picture, enclosed in a large wooden crate, was soon got in. Then Lascelles, having duly paid and discharged the cabman, proceeded to unpack the picture and to exhibit it to his friend with evident pride.

The subject of the work was the martyrdom of St. Agnes; and it was carried out not only with marked technical skill, but also with rare spirit, originality, and breadth. Courtleigh Lickfold (who, though a commonplace, if fairly successful, painter himself, yet knew good work when he saw it) was surprised into an expression of admiration at the sight of the picture:

"I say, old man! This is miles in advance of anything you've done hitherto. There's—damme—there's inspiration in that. Yes! You'll make your hit, right enough, at this year's Academy, anyhow. Excuse my saying so, but I didn't know you had stuff of such quality in you."

Young Lascelles coloured, doubtless with pleasure at Lickfold's undisguised expressions of praise.

"I can't quite tell you how it was," he said. "But it all seemed to come to me by a sort of intuition."

"That's just how the best things do come," nodded Lickfold. "And—well, I wish I could get a few intuitions of the kind; that's all."

"I dare say I shall never get another," replied Lascelles, modestly.

"Even if you don't, you can still make your fortune by judiciously exploiting this one gold mine," remarked Lickfold. "The artistic public is much like the musical public. When once they have associated an artist with a particular style—the style that first won their notice and favour—they don't mind how often he repeats himself, with slight variations, on the same theme. Indeed, they rather prefer it, as making less demand on their limited æsthetic intelligence."

"Still that's not art—the art by which a man's name lives," said Lascelles.

"Possibly not. But it's money—by which a man's body lives," replied Courtleigh Lickfold. "Wasn't it Napoleon who said that an army marched on its stomach? Well, you might adapt the dictum to our profession and say that a painter paints on his stomach. For my part, I confess I'd rather be well-fed and easy-circumstanced, at the expense of Art with a capital 'A,' on this side of the grave, than sacrifice those solid advantages for immortality beyond it."

"Ah! you always were frankly material," said young Lascelles.

"Well, any way, I'm practical," answered Courtleigh Lickfold.

"But, I say, I haven't come to the end of asking favours yet," remarked Lascelles, returning to the object of his visit. "There's something else I want you to do for me, old man."

"What's that?" inquired Lickfold.

"Well, you see," explained Lascelles, regarding his friend tentatively, "in the present acute state of my finances, with all these judgments out against me, and possible bankruptcy ahead, should my creditors think it worth while to incur the expense—it might be rather dangerous, don't you know, to exhibit in the Academy, under my own name, a picture which I have furtively removed from my studio to defeat my creditors. I spoke to a friend of mine, a solicitor, on the subject, and he said they'd be pretty sure to kick up a dust about it, and also to do something which he called 'following the asset.' That means, as I understand him, they'd claim the picture as part of my effects. Now I don't want that to happen on any account, not only because of the public disgrace of it, but also because I am sure it would prejudice the selling value of the picture—buyers never thinking much of the work of any johnny who's down on his luck. And that brings me to the particular favour I want to ask of you. Could you—would you—old man, send the picture to Burlington House in your own name?"

Courtleigh Lickfold whistled.

"Oh! I say! That's too dangerous," he answered. "If the authorities found out, Lord knows what they wouldn't do. Warn us off from all their future exhibitions at the very least."

"But how should they find out?" objected young Lascelles. "Only we two should be in the secret; and neither of us would give away the show, you bet."

"But surely other people have seen this picture of yours, while you were engaged upon it?"

"Not a soul. I have kept it a dead secret. When I have not actually been at work on it, it has been carefully concealed in a cupboard in my studio. And when I have taken it out to work upon it, I have always done so with locked doors. You see, I wanted it to come as an absolute surprise to everybody," he explained.

"But your model—she must have seen it," exclaimed Lickfold.

"I had no model. The whole picture—every detail of it—was so vividly present to my mind, that I felt I could carry it out better without any such tangible object before me," answered Lascelles.

"Still, even assuming that we are safe against discovery," answered Courtleigh Lickfold, regarding his friend's masterpiece with enviously admiring eyes, "I hardly think you can realise what such a course involves—I mean, from your own point of view. You said, just now, that you looked to this picture to make your name and fortune (and 'pon my Sam, I think it's good enough to justify your anticipations); but if I exhibit it in my name, I shall get all the kudos of it——"

"Yes, yes. I know that. But how else can I save the picture from my judgment creditors, and exhibit it under conditions conducive to its fetching a good price? And a good price I must get for it, Court., I tell you that. In my present circumstances, that is the most important thing of all," he added, energetically.

Courtleigh Lickfold smiled.

"Ah! I see you are really of my way of thinking, after all," he said. "When it comes to a choice between money and fame, you prefer the money."

"I do not say I prefer the money," answered young Lascelles. "I merely say that I must have the money; whereas——"

"You can manage to exist without the fame, I suppose?" interjected Lickfold, laughing. "Well, my dear boy, it amounts to the same thing, in effect, when all's said and done. However, seriously—do you really propose that I should exhibit your picture in my name, receive the purchase money for it if it finds a buyer, and hand it over to you?"

"Yes, that is exactly what I do propose," answered young Lascelles, eagerly. "And, I say, do manage it for me, if you can, old chap. You don't know what it means to me."

Courtleigh Lickfold hesitated a moment or two before replying. Like most men who are destitute of moral courage, he was good-natured to this extent, that he found it difficult to say "No" to any friend who importuned him with a vivâ voce request. But it was not only his dislike of saying "No" that caused him to hesitate. There was another reason. Although he might depreciate fame in words, in fact he was as covetous of it, in his indolent way, as any man alive, and he knew that "The Martyrdom of St. Agnes" was bound to be one of the hits of the forthcoming Academy, and that the name of its painter would be on everybody's lips for some time to come. The prospect of himself enjoying that honour, with its accompanying advertisement, was distinctly alluring to him. But—well, it was risky. And he still temporised awhile before actually committing himself.

"You are absolutely certain, old chap, that no other living soul has seen the picture?"

"Absolutely," replied Lascelles, with confidence.

"And that you have mentioned it to no one—discussed it with no one?"

"Most decidedly not. I have kept the whole thing a jealously-guarded secret in myown bosom."

"Then there's not the most remote contingency of this little arrangement leaking out?"

"Not the most remote," answered young Lascelles. "If there were, I shouldn't have thought of asking you."

Courtleigh Lickfold hesitated a moment or two longer. Then, making up his mind, he said:

"Very well, my dear boy. Simply to oblige you, I'll take on the job."

"Thanks awfully! It's really deuced good of you. I shan't forget your kindness," answered Lascelles, gratefully.

It was about the end of March that the above interview took place. Ten days, or so, later Courtleigh Lickfold had a hasty and rather incoherent note from Lascelles, to the effect that he had found it expedient to go abroad for a while, to evade the attentions of his innumerable duns, and that he should probably be absent for several months. This was the last Lickfold heard of him for some time.

In the meanwhile, pursuant to his arrangement with Lascelles, he took the latter's picture (in his own name) to Burlington House, where it was accepted by the Committee and hung in an excellent position on the line. The work, as anticipated both by Lascelles and Lickfold, at once attracted attention, and was soon installed one of the most talked-about exhibits of the year. Nor was it merely a succès d'estime. The admiration it evoked took practical shape. In the course of a fortnight, Lickfold received at least half-a-dozen offers for the picture, and eventually closed with that of a millionaire manufacturer, who bid the handsome sum of £800, and, immediately upon Lickfold's acceptance of the offer, sent him a cheque for that amount.

As Lascelles had left him no address nor given him any clue to his present whereabouts, Lickfold paid the money into his own bank pending his friend's return to claim it; and, had the latter turned up at that conjuncture, he would no doubt have duly handed it over to him. But Lascelles still lay low in his hiding place on the Continent, and, while he lingered, Courtleigh Lickfold's own finances, seldom very prosperous, became perilously rocky. Funds had to be found for this, that, and the other pressing necessity, with the result that Lickfold, though not naturally dishonest in money matters, found himself trenching heavily upon the £800 held by him, in trust, for his friend. It was only borrowing, of course. He should make it good all right, somehow or another. So he honestly assured himself. So doubtless honestly assure themselves nine out of every ten men who use money which does not belong to them. And perhaps one out of the nine does manage to replace it. But how about the other eight?

The first intimation Courtleigh Lickfold had of Lascelles' return to England was conveyed to him in a letter of the most astounding character—a letter which, at first, he could only believe to be some stupid, far-fetched hoax.

It purported to come from a firm of solicitors in the City, and ran as follows:—

1,001, Cannon-street, E.C.
July 4, 19—.

SIR,—Our client, Mr. Francis Lascelles, who has just returned from abroad, has learnt with the utmost astonishment that you have exhibited in the Royal Academy, under your own name, and sold for a large sum as your own property, his picture, "The Martyrdom of St. Agnes," which, before his departure, he left with you for safe custody.

Before taking the necessary steps to call you to account for this gross and scandalous breach of trust, our client desires us to give you the opportunity of offering an explanation of the same, which we hereby request you to do without delay.—We are, sir, your obedient servants, JEFFREYS AND HYDE.

Courtleigh Lickfold, Esq.

To say that Lickfold was amazed by the letter, would be feebly to express his feelings. At first, as has been said, he persuaded himself that it must be some stupid practical joke. But, as to that, he was soon undeceived. For, calling upon Jeffreys and Hyde to know what the deuce they meant, he was informed by one of their clerks that they declined to see him and that anything he had to say must be put in writing.

Intensely bewildered and furiously indignant, he went round to demand an explanation of Frank Lascelles. But Lascelles, it appeared, had given up his rooms some months ago, and the landlady had no knowledge of his present address. A visit to his friend's club proved no more satisfactory; for he was informed by the steward that Mr. Lascelles had not been there for some time. Lickfold, therefore, as the only way of getting at Lascelles, was obliged to write to him under cover of the latter's bankers, whom he happened to know, requesting them to forward his letter on at once.

Two days later, he received a curt reply from Lascelles, couched in the following terms:—

I decline to hold any communication with you. Be good enough to address all further correspondence to my solicitors.

F. LASCELLES.

Courtleigh Lickfold, more astounded than ever by this amazing and insolent reply, and now seeing that the practical joke theory was untenable, could only come to the conclusion that Lascelles' financial troubles must have turned his brain, and that he had gone staring mad. But of this idea, also, he was speedily to be disabused.

Having failed to comply—through inability—with a peremptory demand from Jeffreys and Hyde for the repayment of the £800 which he had received for "The Martyrdom of St. Agnes," he was arrested, two days later, on a warrant, and brought up at Marlborough-street, charged with the fraudulent conversion of the money.

Then, and not till then, did he fully realise the perilously awkward situation in which he stood. There was not a scrap of writing to offer in evidence of his verbal arrangement with Lascelles, and if the latter chose to repudiate it in the witness-box, then his (Lickfold's) position would indeed be an awkward one.

And this, in fact, is precisely what Lascelles did. He repudiated, on oath, and in the most convincingly indignant manner, Lickfold's version of the affair, deposing that he had merely left the picture with his friend for safe custody during his absence abroad, and that so absurd and dishonest a notion as that of arranging with Lickfold to exhibit the picture in his own name, had never entered hs head. He also made the damaging assertion that, when he last saw Lickfold, he had given the latter to understand he was going to Australia, and probably should not be back for twelve or eighteen months; and that it was only owing to his sudden change of plans and return to England so unexpectedly soon that he had been made aware of the fraud practised on him.

With this false evidence a good deal of truth in the shape of evidence as to Lickfold's pecuniary embarrassments was artfully mixed up. Lascelles' version of the affair—so much more probable on the face of it than Lickfold's seemingly far-fetched story—was accepted by the magistrate, who committed the prisoner to the Old Bailey, fixing prohibitive bail; and the upshot was that the unfortunate man was convicted and sent to hard labour for eighteen months, the Recorder remarking that it was one of the worst cases he had come across for some time.

It was not until after he came out of prison, at the expiration of his sentence, a broken, ruined, and utterly discredited man, that Courtleigh Lickfold learnt, from Lascelles' own lips, the true explanation of his perjured evidence.

Lascelles sought him out in the garret to which he was now reduced, and seemed to gloat over the wreck of his once friend, whom he had so foully injured and betrayed.

"You broke the heart of the woman I loved better than my life, Courtleigh Lickfold," he said. "And murdered—yes, in the sight of God you murdered—her. I vowed vengeance on you. I have executed it. Now you understand."

"What do you mean, you—you—devil?" cried the wretched Lickfold.

"I mean what I have said," answered Lascelles, gazing at the broken creature before him in fierce, pitiless exultation. "It was her death that inspired me with my theme of 'The Martyrdom of St. Agnes,' that urged me to employ it, as I employed it, to make you taste the bitterness of being betrayed by one you trusted, and to force to your lips the same cup that you yourself forced to the lips of Hilda Mountjoy."

ART NOTES.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

First Notice.

THERE is, I take it, only one reason why every critic will not this year acclaim the R.A. show as quite the worst which has ever been held in Burlington House. It is because he fears that every other critic will say exactly the same thing; and in these days of precarious journalistic tenure, it is above all things necessary to be distinctive. As a matter of fact—and it is one of the charms of the R.A. that this should be so—whatever he says is nearly certain to be more or less right. It were perfectly right to acclaim it as the worst exhibition on record; perfectly right to contend that it is about up to the usual annual average; perfectly right, again, to say that it is rather better than usual. These be not paradoxes, rather points of view. Let us consider the standard of criticism by which the Academy is judged. There is the critic who argues, very justly, that the beauty of a picture is in the eye of the beholder—so far, at any rate, as the popular press is concerned. He knows that the public likes a certain style of artistic cookery—something sweet to the taste, not heating, distinguishable as to its flavouring—the works, in fact, of the Old Brigade of R.A.s. To him the present show will prove, I take it, distinctly disappointing, because, although the Old Brigade have not by any means been driven from the field, they are very evidently harassed by the fire of a number of revolutionary sharpshooters, who have seized strong positions on the Academical flanks, and seem quite likely to sooner or later carry the whole position. There are those critics, again, to whom the very mention of an Academical name is as a red rag to a bull. They should look upon the Academy of 1907 with lenient, almost with approving eyes, for it is emphatically an "outsiders'" year. Lastly, there are those—and I am of their number—who hold that the average level of the pictures shown varies little or nothing as the years roll by. It is almost impossible that it should, if we consider the circumstances under which the exhibits are selected, which come to something as near pure chance as need be. Consider. The selection lies with a number of more or less elderly gentlemen, well-meaning enough, and knowing, less, indeed, than the critics, but something about pictures. Before them passes, escorted by carpenters, a long procession of paintings, usually somewhere about 15,000, speaking broadly. Would it be possible for a committee of Archangels to choose out from them the 2,000 or so which are most deserving of admiration? How much less so, then, for Academicians. Consider how disastrous is the effect upon eye and brain of closely considering the merits of even 150 paintings. Consider, again, that only a certain limited amount of wall-space is available, and that the proper fitting together of the canvas-mosaic which is to cover it demands the genius of a committee of mathematical experts, and that one picture, not of the proper size or shape, may throw the whole into confusion. Is it not perfectly evident that the one quality in a painter which can secure the acceptance of his work is luck? And luck being merely the logical conclusion of the law of averages, it follows that the pictures hung are, as nearly as possible, a fair representation of those submitted, as far, at least, as would be a basket of apples, picked at random from a barrel, of its contents. And as the average artistic level of the country changes only very slowly, if at all, it should follow that one Academy Show can differ very slightly indeed from its immediate predecessors and successors. The real unknown quantity, upon which the popular and critical verdict depends, rests in perhaps half a dozen paintings every year—those which are known as "pictures of the year." Their vogue has, as perhaps I need not mention, little or nothing to do with their artistic excellences, or the reverse. They usually, of recent years, include one or more of Mr. Sargent's portraits—not because Mr. Sargent happens to be a very able painter, but because the great "artistic" public have come to realise that he is so considered, and find in their knowledge thereof a safe and certain recipe for being "in the movement." For the rest, very much depends upon the news- and sub-editors of the ha'penny daily press. You may generally, I mean, obtain a fairly good idea of which they will be by watching the "snippet" columns and seeing which item of "art" gossip is most persistently quoted. Naturally, as we are a loyal nation, those into which the name of Royalty can be introduced are the most eligible, from this point of view. There are two very good examples of this sort of thing in the present exhibition. One is Mr. Cope's portrait of King Edward; the other Mr. Conrad Dressler's statue of the Queen of Spain. Mr. Cope's picture, which is quite up to the average of Royal portraits, has been hailed by a perfect chorus of "snippet" paragraphs, evidently inserted by some one who knows everything that passes in the Royal Household and the Royal brain. They deal with the preliminaries which attended the bestowal of the commission upon the able and fortunate painter. It seems that the painter was expected to attend at one of the Royal residences for the necessary sittings. But Mr. Cope (I speak entirely on the authority of the ha'penny press) being a man of mettle and having a proper regard to the dignity of his profession, replied somewhat as follows: "No. England has had a long succession of Kings, and but one Arthur S. Cope, Associate of the Royal Academy. If any one is to do the calling, it will not be the Associate." Upon this being reported to the King, his Majesty burst, as it were, into tears, applauded the noble independence of the Briton and the artist, and repaired to his studio as often as was required. This is a very touching anecdote, redounding to the credit of all parties concerned, and if Mr. Cope's canvas be not one of the "pictures of the year," it will certainly not be the fault of the original reporter, whose name, I should think, is very likely Vincent Crummles.

Mr. Conrad Dressler's portrait-bust is an example of another sure road to public favour, in that it was in the first place rejected by the Royal Academy. As it had the additional merit of being afterwards reinstated by Royal command, a fact which became subsequently known to another, or perhaps the same, lynx-eyed reporter, its popular success was and remains assured. I take it that the Royal command was issued upon political rather than artistic grounds; but that is a detail. Certainly the sculptor is warmly to be congratulated; otherwise I doubt very much if the bust would have been noticed at all, for, with the best intentions in the world, I have been able to descry nothing in which it differs from the ordinary Royal bust of the ordinary Royal personage, and it is not, to my mind, a particularly striking example of that. I have no doubt there are several other pictures and statues of the year, but as I have not, since the private view, studied the ha'penny papers as closely as I could desire, I am quite unable to say which those pictures and sculptures are.

One of the most likeable points about the Royal Academy is that you always know exactly what you are going to see before you see it. The same artists, or most of them, always send exactly the same kind of work year after year, and, given but a copy of the catalogue, you are able to survey the whole exhibition at your leisure, without going within ten miles of Burlington House. You know, for instance, that there are certain to be a number of Mr. Sargent's portraits of titled ladies. You know, too, exactly how they will be painted, and you are perfectly well aware—if you study the latest fashions, that is to say—how they will be dressed. Similarly, it is quite unnecessary to see the canvases to be able to apply the appropriate adjectives—according to your artistic leanings—of "brilliant," "superficial," "powerful," "masterly," or "flashy." Accordingly, opening your catalogue, and finding entries referring to portraits of "Lady Speyer," "Lady Sassoon," "Lady Eden," or "The Countess of Essex," you require to be told nothing further, except, indeed, that Lady Eden is emphasising the virtue of Patience with a pack of cards, and that Lady Speyer is playing the violin and putting into it some very notable wrist-work. Both of these points are merely details, however, as is it that the "Lady Sassoon" is much the best of the works shown by the most fashionable of portrait painters this year.

Before you open your catalogue again you may run over in your head the names of a few of the more prominent exhibitors, and decide what they have in all probability sent in. There is, first of all, the President. You will remember that Sir Edward Poynter has, of recent years, shown a penchant—to my mind a wise one—for small pictures. In all probability, you decide, he will have one, or more, small classical compositions, rather cold, rather hard, very competent, not quite inspired. You will be right. This year he has a couple, "Lesbia and her Sparrow," a draped Greek girl against a vine trellis, more attractive in colour than you will have quite expected, and "Fishing," a title which, being strictly non-committal, may puzzle you a little. Nevertheless, it is quite according to type: a young lady, who for some reason prefers not to wear any clothes—and is, accordingly, classical—fishing in a stream. The surrounding atmosphere is damp, and the young lady is risking a severe chill, if not rheumatic fever—but that has really nothing to do with the picture. You will also be on the look-out for some of the beautiful little water-colour landscapes which contain much of the President's best work; nor will you be disappointed, for he exhibits three of them.

Still without troubling to visit Burlington House—and thereby escaping the inevitable crush of the first few days—you may re-make the acquaintance of quite a number of old friends—always through the catalogue. Mr. A. W. B. Davis' pleasantly particular landscapes, for instance, animated, it is safe to guess, by sheep; and Mr. G. D. Leslie's studies of stagnant water, in a green haze suggesting duck-weed; and Mr. Stanhope Forbes' fishing-boats; and Mr. Waterhouse's more or less classic nymphs, very nicely painted, and yearning after the Burne-Jones Convention; and Mr. Leader, and Mr. Farquharson, and Mr. Marcus Stone, and Sir Luke Fildes, and Mr. B. W. Leader—are not their works and styles and subjects already as familiar as household words?

After the certainties, you will come to the consideration of the probabilities. You will expect to find a "great religious painting," but in this you will be mistaken. Probably this is because there are already so many "great religious paintings" touring the provinces according to custom, that there are no further opportunities for advance bookings this year. But there is a splendid study in didactics, instead. It is by Mr. Sigismund Goetze, and it is called "Greatest of These," and, I think, it is a facer for the Suffragettes. It shows us a mamma in stage costume nursing her baby, and surrounded by a party of lady friends whom she resolutely ignores. One of them, sad to say, is smoking a cigarette, and some are motorists, and others have banners inscribed, "Votes for Women," or words to that effect, and altogether the canvas fulfils a great moral purpose. It makes you laugh, too, which is another point in its favour, and I think I can see the suburbs rallying round it—but seriously, and with bated breath.

Of course, you will expect to find an indictment of the sins of society by Mr. John Collier, who has fairly earned for himself the title of the Bernard Vaughan of Art. This time you will be right. It is called the "Mariage de Convenance," a title which, if I remember aright, has been already plagiarised by a painter called Hogarth. Mr. Collier shows us a lady dissolved in tears and in a very charming lace bed-gown, weeping by the side of a bed on which is displayed her wedding-dress. As she is weeping, her hair is, of course, hanging desolately about her shoulders. Leaning against the mantelpiece is another lady, whom I surmise to be the first lady's mamma, though she looks almost young enough to be her sister. In general suggestion she reminds us of that immortal play, "The Worst Woman in London," so unkindly does she sneer, and involuntarily the words of the Cockney lover rise to our lips: "Not so 'orty, please." Any mamma who, after seeing this picture, refuses to let her daughter marry whomever she likes, be he dustman or dancing-master, without regard to income, will be nothing less than a cat.

Naturally you will expect to find at least one large historical subject, and if you are an observer of current history, you will not be surprised if it turns out to have something to do with Joan of Arc. It does. It is by Mr. Frank Craig, whose smaller painting, "The Heretic," was purchased for the Chantrey Bequest last year, and it is called "The Maid." It shows her charging at the head of Gallic chivalry, on a very active horse. The Gallic chivalry are armed with very new red lances, so neatly kept and bright that they look as though they might have been bought from the property-room not half an hour previously. With them they are attacking a row of English archers, lining a ditch, and for the most part regarding Joan with an air of polite, if distrustful, interest, evidently being unused to, and more than a little shocked by, such pressing advances from a lady, French though she be.

Of course, you will expect to find the usual number of more or less naked studies of the nude. You will find one, called "Roses of Youth," by Miss Henrietta Rae—a figure of a young lady who, having donned a wreath of roses, as recommended by the poet, seems to be wondering if she has not forgotten something. And there is another, "An Island Festival," by Mr. Charles Sims, which shows us a whole prehistoric village (I trust it is prehistoric, that is to say) dancing round the contemporary substitute for a maypole, in the costume of the naked truth. It is one of the best-painted pictures in the exhibition, to my mind. Then there is—but I have already allowed my enthusiasm to carry me too far, and must reserve any further reflections until next week.

MUSIC.

A GOOD START AT COVENT GARDEN.

THE opera season has made quite a good start. Well-behaved little boys and girls are always told that they must dispose of a certain quantity of bread and butter before they indulge their appetite for cake, and in somewhat the same spirit Covent Garden requires its supporters to dispose of the "Ring" before addressing themselves to the lighter fare which will subsequently be provided. It is an excellent arrangement, which has the advantage of bringing all with appetites unimpaired to that portion of the banquet which certainly makes the most serious demands upon the musical digestion. One of the papers, I notice, speaks of "the gloom inseparable from the 'Ring' performances," but that remark could, of course, be intended to apply only to the lighting arrangements, which convert the opera house into a camera obscura during the representations of the tetralogy—and, indeed, of all the other works in which the German language is employed, for the same rule was observed in the case also of "Bastien und Bastienne" and "Hänsel und Gretel." The weaker brethren may cry out and complain that they can neither read their books nor see who is in the boxes, but the management, unmoved by the paltry gibe which attributes their action to a desire to keep down their lighting bill, have hardened their hearts and turned a deaf ear to all appeals on the subject. What is really remarkable, perhaps, is the fact that they should be able to do this. Hardly anything could indicate more forcibly the distance which we have travelled since earlier days, when the opera house was regarded as merely a rendezvous for the fashionable and the frivolous. A few of this class are still to be seen, of course, here and there, at Covent Garden, but the "Ring" is sufficient answer to those who would suggest that they and their like are the only ones to whom grand opera appeals to-day.

The performance of the first cycle concluded on Monday, and without attaining any miraculous heights of excellence it could, on the whole, be heartily praised. Once again the orchestra under Richter has borne off the lion's share of the honours, and in this connection it is worth recalling again, what is not always realised, that the Covent Garden band is one of the oldest permanent orchestras which we have in London, to which fact, no doubt, not a little of its excellence is due. Many people who think of it as more or less a scratch affair would be surprised to learn how few have been the changes in its personnel during the last twenty years or so. Under Richter it has once again done great things in the "Ring," and will no doubt continue equally to distinguish itself during the remainder of the season. Some capital singing was heard, too, though the performances of the second cycle, which begin to-day (Wednesday) with Van Rooy as Wotan, will probably be better still in this respect. Herr Whitehill did very well, but he is not a Van Rooy, nor were, for that matter, all the other artists quite the equal of some who have appeared in former seasons, though doubtless the best procurable. Among the newcomers Herr Bechstein has been properly complimented on his Mime, while Herr Stockhausen did quite well, too, as Donner and Gunther. The others were mostly old friends, among whom it was particularly pleasant to hear again that fine artist Mme. Gulbranson, who has not been with us for some little time. Her Brünnhilde was superb, and quite the best individual performance so far witnessed. Would that one could speak in like terms of Herr Kraus's Siegmund and Siegfried! But that is an old, old story. Herr Zador's Alberich has been praised by some, and it was certainly vigorous enough, though it was rather too suggestive of a pantomime ogre for my liking. Herr Jörn's Loge was much more acceptable in its self-restraint and subtlety. Among the several English artists who appeared Mme. Kirkby Lunn had most to do, and did it very well, as Fricka, while nearly all the Walküren were born on this side of the Channel, though I am afraid this hardly justified the enthusiastic headline of the Daily Mail, "Almost a British cast."

Besides the "Ring," we have had the other operas above named, and both were interesting to hear, especially "Hänsel und Gretel," which was given in excellent style, with Frl. Fiebiger and Frl. Hempel—new-comers both—as the two children. Frau Tolli, who has also come to us for the first time this season, did well in this, too, as Gertrude, as she had done previously in the "Ring." Humperdinck's lovely work is always a joy to listen to, and it would be pleasant to think that henceforward it will find its place regularly in the repertory. Many would be glad, too, if the management could give a hearing to some of Humperdinck's later operas. The production of "Bastien und Bastienne" is, of course, rather a satire on the fact that the only other work of Mozart which we hear in the ordinary way at Covent Garden is "Don Giovanni." Musically, its interest is almost purely historical. But if it serves to remind us of certain other and later works from the same hand which we would gladly hear, it will not have been produced in vain. Mozart died young, it is true, but he was not cut off at twelve. For Tuesday Nicolai's "Merry Wives" was announced, and the rest of the week will be repetitions.

A good deal of curiosity is being felt in musical circles just now as to the management of the new concert hall in Great Portland-street, the foundation-stone of which was recently laid by the Lord Mayor. It will be remembered that the leading concert agents have entered into a common undertaking not to give any concerts at the hall so long as it remains under the management of the firm (Messrs. Vert and Sinkins) at present connected with it, and, presumably as a consequence of this action, it was recently stated that a new manager would shortly be appointed. Those concerned are awaiting with interest, therefore, a further announcement on the subject.

Meanwhile, it will have been noticed that Messrs. Vert and Sinkins were the plaintiffs in an interesting case heard at the Westminster County Court last week, in which they sued the Orchestrelle Co., the proprietors of the Æolian Hall, for commission in respect of certain bookings of the hall. The defendants, however, counterclaimed for the hire of the hall on certain dates which Messrs. Vert and Sinkins had booked but not taken up, and the decision was in their favour. There had been no written contracts, it appeared, between the parties, the arrangements having been made by telephone, but Messrs. Vert and Sinkins had advertised concerts at the hall on the dates in question, and Judge Woodfall took the very natural view that this was sufficient to establish the Orchestrelle Company's claim, and gave judgment accordingly. It would, of course, be an exceedingly unsatisfactory state of things if concert agents could book dates, thereby forestalling their rivals, and afterwards repudiate liability.

The concert season is in full blast now, with the result of poor audiences in most cases. Even at the Santley Jubilee concert last week there were whole blocks of empty seats. But even so, there were, of course, many thousands present to acclaim the hero of the hour and make the affair a success. At the Philharmonic concert on Thursday it was pleasant to hear Mme. Sophie Menter again. Despite her years she played as brilliantly as any one could wish. In the afternoon Herr Fritz Kreisler was the soloist at the Queen's Hall Symphony concert and played magnificently, despite the handicap of a sprained ankle which was bad enough to cause considerable suffering. He was heard in works by Mozart, Max Bruch, and Saint-Saëns, and in one and all delighted his hearers. Another violinist of note lately heard has been Franz von Vecsey, who, after some years' absence, proved that he has grown in musical as well as in physical stature. His playing in Mendelssohn's concerto was, indeed, a wonderful achievement for a lad of his years, and it can hardly be doubted that he will become, in due course, one of the greatest violinists of his time. Herr Godowsky, who gave his last recital of the present season on Saturday, astounded all his hearers once again by his diabolical technique. Sir James Crichton-Browne, who has been deprecating the cultivation of ambidexterity as an attempt to fly in the face of nature, should compare notes with Godowsky. On Monday M. Safonoff was the conductor at the London Symphony Orchestra's concert and made a great effect, as on a previous occasion, with Tchaikowsky's Pathetic symphony. Many other concerts and recitals have been given which I have no space to refer to.

Many will learn with interest that Mr. Lionel Monckton has resigned his position as musical critic on the Daily Telegraph. For some considerable time past now Mr. Monckton's health has not been satisfactory, and it is understood that this has led to his withdrawal. Happily, Mr. Monckton, as one of the most popular composers of the day, is quite independent of the poor rewards of journalism, and in his case at any rate the classic definition of the critic as one who has failed at the trade which he criticises has certainly not applied. As a critic, too, Mr. Monckton has always done excellent work, the soundness and penetration of his judgments having been no less conspicuous than the literary felicity with which they have been expressed.

Apropos of the pitch problem, Mr. C. A. Hankey writes as follows from the Reform Club:—

I am pleased to see TRUTH advocating the general adoption of the "diapason normal," and that the charge for the regimental bands is estimated not to exceed £30,000, and for the Albert Hall organ £1,500. It appears to me that if a subscription were started this sum would before long be obtained. Possibly some wealthy individual strongly favouring the change might find it all. Concerts also might be given, for which eminent vocalists and instrumentalists would gladly give their services without payment. I hope that you will not let the matter drop, but give it your powerful support.

The suggestion pre-supposes, I am afraid, greater general enthusiasm on the subject than actually exists. From this point of view, indeed, it would probably be easier to secure such co-operative action as my correspondent suggests if, so far as ordinary concerts go, the diapason normal were not now pretty generally established. It is the military bands which, as I explained, stand in the way. At the same time, if something could be done on such lines as those suggested, if only a little, it would be a step in the right direction, and if a beginning were made, the rest might follow more quickly than some suppose. There is, I believe, one regimental band already provided with instruments at the lower pitch, namely, that of the Grenadier Guards, who had a set specially made when they visited America some time ago.

I have received the following important announcement, to which, in the interests of the musical community at large, I gladly give publicity:—

PRIZE FOR A SIMPLE MELODY.

Feeling that modern Music is becoming far too complex and noisy, ERNEST NEWLANDSMITH (Missioner of the Laresol Society; Associate of the Royal Academy of Music; Author of "The Temple of Art"; "The Temple of Love"; "Art Ideals"; Editor of "The Laresol Review"; etc., etc.), offers a Prize of

for the best composition by an amateur or professional in the form of

A SIMPLE MELODY.

The Melody must be written in accordance with the spirit of the article which appeared in THE LARESOL REVIEW for November, 1906, entitled "A New Order of Art," and must be suitable for performance at a Service as described in THE LARESOL REVIEW, February, 1907.

No ENTRANCE FEE.

The Review can be obtained from Messrs. Smith and Sons' Bookstalls, or from Leslie Hibberd, 17, Hanover Square, W.

N.B.—The melody may be grave or gay; with or without accompaniment; in the form of a set piece or merely a simple tune, as the composer feels disposed; and it may be either vocal or instrumental, or quite apart from any fixed idea as to the method of performance.

All the MS.S. should be sent with the Name and Address of the Composer to Mr. Leslie Hibberd, on or before June 30th next.

The Prize will be awarded for the Melody that is considered to be most in keeping with the articles above referred to, and will be given to either an amateur or professional without any preference whatsoever.

Who shall say after this that music offers its votaries no prizes? The result of the competition will, I imagine, be announced in due course in the Laresol Review, two earlier issues of which, I notice, must be procured as a condition preliminary to entering for this most alluring competition. Mr. Newlandsmith is I believe, an apostle of the "simple" life. Wherefore his quest of a "simple" melody from (I suppose) "simple" musicians. O sancta simplicitas!

Mr. Thomas F. Dunhill, who is one of the cleverest of our younger composers, writes to announce his intention to give a series of chamber concerts in London very shortly, a special feature of which will be the performance of British works which have been previously heard and pronounced good. Quite truly Mr. Dunhill observes that such works are too frequently given once, "with the idea," as he candidly puts it, "of attracting the chief musical critics by performing a new work for the first time," and then shelved for ever. Hence the familiar legend "first time" will have no place in his programmes, but instead works will be repeated which have previously proved their claim to further hearing. He adds, too, that each programme will also contain certain standard compositions of acknowledged excellence, as counterweight to the novelties. The scheme seems quite a good one, but I should advise Mr. Dunhill to postpone its execution till the autumn, when concerts of this nature would be more likely to receive attention than at such a busy time as the present.

The announcement that Gustav Mahler has completed his seventh symphony moves a contemporary to inquire when we are likely to hear more of his music in England. As it is truly observed, there are those who hold it in high esteem in Germany, though it cannot honestly be said that such works from his pen as have hitherto been given in London have induced a very exalted opinion of his work here. It is alarming to reflect, however, what would happen to anyone who ventured to convey such an estimate of his music to the composer himself, for Mahler is a man of volcanic temperament, and the anecdotes are many going to illustrate the violence of his methods when aroused. Like von Bülow (of whom it was said that he would have his own way if it meant the death of his players), Mahler is a conductor who gains his ends, not after the Nikisch method of sweet reasonableness, but by the exercise of the sternest discipline. It is emphatically not all done by kindness in his case, and singers and instrumentalists alike—nay, even Hof-Intendants and more august personages still have to adapt themselves to his imperious will. But there is no denying the genius as well as the deadly earnestness of the man, and so he holds his own. Whether, however, his music is great is another matter.

A correspondent writes:—"Would it be possible to start a Brahms-Cherubini Society for supplying scores, parts, and English versions, etc., to choral and orchestral societies? At present 'Lodoiska' and 'Faniska,' with their wealth of melody, harmony, and dramatic power, are mere names to most Britishers; Brahms's 'Rinaldo' and 'Triumplied,' little more than names, while even the four symphonies are played far less often than they might be." I am afraid such a society would not obtain very much support, and I am not sure that it is really needed, so far as Brahms is concerned, at any rate. Why, indeed, Brahms and Cherubini should be linked together I do not quite know, since they certainly do not stand on the same footing in the matter of popularity and general appreciation.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—Mrs. Sellar's "Recollections and Impressions" (1) is dedicated to "my children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren," for whom alone, indeed, it was originally written, and its undress character is still further indicated in its preface, where the punning title suggested by a friend, "Cobwebs from an old Cellar," is appreciated for its appropriateness. But Mrs. Sellar not only writes in undress herself, but exhibits in undress some of her famous friends, much to your gratification. "He that is never a fool is always a fool" is an excellent proverb, and you think the better of Tennyson, Browning, Matthew Arnold, etc., for their child-like or childish intervals. With the remembrance of the stained-glass window Tennyson presented to you in his son's biography of the poet, it is refreshing to find him rattling off such preposterous nonsense verses as these as fast as his tongue could utter them:—

They found her buried in the moor,
Shut out from every hope;
And her bonny little noseling
Was brown as Windsor soap!

(1) "Recollections and Impressions." By E. M. Sellar. (London: William Blackwood & Sons. 10s. 6d. net.)

(2) "The Mystics." By Katherine Cecil Thurston. (London: William Blackwood & Sons. 3s. 6d.)

(3) "Where Love Leads." By Charles Garvice. (London: Hutchinson & Co. 6s.)

(4) "Married in Haste" By E. Everett Green. (London: Hutchinson & Co. 6s.)

(5) "Petronel of Paradise." By Mrs. Fred Maturin. (London: Eveleigh Nash. 6s.)

Tennyson could be complimentary, too, in impromptu verse, which, when you remember Max Muller's account of the poet, you hardly expected. When he spent an additional day with the Sellars, owing to his having missed a trip to Skye, he said:—

If he did not see Loch Coruisk,
He ought to be forgiven;
For though he miss'd a day in Skye,
He spent a day in Heaven!

He pronounced "Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon" the most simple and beautiful love-song ever written, which no doubt it is. Altogether he made a most favourable impression on every one with whom he came in contact, except, indeed, the Gaelic boatman who rowed him and Palgrave fifteen miles to Oban. "Robert," said Mr. Sellars to this old Charon, "you are taking over to Oban one of the greatest men in England." "What!" he exclaimed, "that black-a-vise, Mr. Tinsmith, that came with Mr. Pancake! Well, well!" It is no less refreshing to find the very superior Matthew Arnold putting off his grand manner and going down, so to say, on all-fours like a child with children. When Mrs. Sellar met him in London at dinner, he shouted across to his host, who, he supposed, was wondering at his hair being untouched by time, "Ah, Sandars, you are jealous! You think it is a wig! But pull it, Sandars, pull it!" Another friend, upon meeting Arnold in Bond-street, asked him where he had been. "At Douglas's, having that perpetual miracle, my hair, cut!" You get a very pleasant glimpse of Browning, who told Mrs. Sellar that when he sent his godson (Tennyson's grandson, called Alfred Stanley Browning) a present, reminding him of his three great sponsors thus, "You have three names: one glorious, another good, the last that of an old friend who takes great interest in you," he received the following reply from the boy: "But are not you, too rather glorious?" Herbert Spencer seems, indeed, the only friend who did not, because he could not, relax even in the genial company of Mrs. Sellar. Once, when they sat next to each other at a wedding breakfast, and were recalling together the many years of their friendship, she said: "Yes, Mr. Spencer, we have lived and loved together through many a changing year!" "We have lived," he corrected, with decision. "He was," says Mrs. Sellar, "full of fads and theories about his health, and was afraid to get into an argument lest it should disturb his 'somniferous faculties.'" Once, when Mr. Jowett was staying with us and we were going to spend the afternoon at Achranich, so great was his fear of an encounter of wits that he lay down with india-rubber balls on his ears—an invention of his own—which proved so successful that he fell asleep, and when he awoke Mr. Jowett had come and gone!" Herbert Spencer need have had no fear of Jowett's loquacity, since the famous Master of Balliol hated talk so intensely that, after listening to a torrent of it from that pioneer of medical education, Miss Jex Blake, he said to a friend, "As lex is the Latin for law, I suppose Jex is for jaw." This is not a brilliant mot; for such sallies you must look to that witty Scotch judge, Lord Young. When there was some delay at his house in serving the soup at dinner, he whispered to Mrs. Sellar: "An appropriate grace would be, 'Lord, make haste to help us!'" When a hair-splitting clerical deputation waited upon him he asked, were they Free Church? "Well, not exactly," they replied, hesitatingly. "'U.P.s' then?" "That was nearer the mark, but they differed from them in some points." "Then," said Lord Young, out of all patience, "I shall write you down as split peas." Surely, by the way, the sarcasm, here attributed to Lord Young, upon the gift of half a million to the Church of Scotland by an unworthy son of that communion, as "the heaviest insurance against fire ever heard of," is of older date? It is odd to find Mrs. Sellar attributing to Jowett Johnson's famous phrase, "Keeping his friendships in repair," and forgetting that it was O'Connell who said of Peel's chill smile that "it was like the silver plate on a coffin." Here is an amusing anecdote of the father of the present Archbishop of Canterbury. Coming down the stairs of his own house he met a young woman coming up whose face he did not know. "Who are you?" he asked. "Please, sir, I'm between the cook and housemaid." "God help you!" he sighed, and passed solemnly on. One more specimen of this chatty, charming volume, and I have done with it. When Dr. Lushington's partial condemnation of the Colenso judgment was reversed by Lord Westbury, Lord Bowen wrote on the margin of his copy of the Chancellor's judgment, "Hell dismissed with costs." Here is a riddle of that witty, amiable, and able judge: "Why is a step-father an inexpensive article?" "Because ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte."

Mrs. Thurston's "The Mystics" (2) is a most disappointing book. The Mokanna of the Mystics is neither a credible nor a creditable hero, while these fanatics themselves are too silly to be worth the elaborate pains he takes to impose upon them. He swears solemnly to his dying uncle not to touch his body or anything belonging to his body till the Arch-Councillor of the Mystics comes; yet no sooner is the old man dead than, in his rage at being left by him only £500, he takes from the corpse the key of the cabinet that held the Bible of the sect. From it he learns how, when, and where the Prophet expected by the Mystics should appear, and this knowledge enables him to personate the Messiah successfully. It is a vulgar cheat from a vulgar motive, and your sympathies are so estranged from the impostor that you rather hope for his exposure than fear it. How it comes and how he escapes its consequences I must leave you to discover for yourself, as in this denouement lies the chief interest of the story. You have incident enough and to spare in Mr. Charles Garvice's "Where Love Leads" (3), though perhaps the author plagiarises himself a little too often. The hero is no less than twice knocked on the head by the villain, while the heroine is no less than thrice rescued by the hero from robbers. Then you have a treasure island sown with rubies which the hero discovers by the aid of a chart, and of which he is subsequently robbed by the villain. I should not like to say how often in fiction the hero turns out to be the very man the heroine is bound to marry, and not his rival, who had all along been supposed to be her destined husband. Thus she can at last give, with the consent of both her conscience and her heart, her hand to her fisher boy. Miss Everett Green's "Married in Haste" (4) keeps the startling promise of its opening sentence, "Will you marry me?" the proposal of a young girl to an aged colonel to whom she never had spoken in her life before. He does marry her, and then follow all kinds of murderous plots—most of them, to say the truth, rather childish—to wreck their happiness, and even their lives. I fancy, however, that young girls would enjoy this rather old-fashioned novel. I cannot say I care for the kind of humour with which "Petronel of Paradise" (5) opens. There's nothing exquisitely funny in taking a kind old lady out of her depth "till two legs with two feet at the ends ornamented on each small toe with Allcock's corn plaster appeared waving a last frantic adieu to the world." Then the heroine's pre-existence, her elaborate somnambulism, and her elopement with the hero, are all wildly improbable, while their melodramatic death together fails to affect you.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely, DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

The memoirs of the Comtesse de Boigne, 1781-1814, are probably the last of the great French memoirs hitherto unpublished. Mme. de Boigne, the intimate friend of Mme. Récamier, and the head of one of the smartest Salons in Paris, frequented by Mme. de Stael and Chateaubriand, wrote her memoirs late in life, at an age when ripe reflection and the wisdom of a woman of the world who had seen and known every one enabled her to draw a clear picture of society at the turn of the nineteenth century, and on through all the years of Napoleon. The first volume has just appeared in France, and an English edition will be brought out immediately by Mr. William Heinemann. Mme. de Boigne, who was of half-English extraction, lived for many years in Yorkshire and in London, and an interesting feature in her book is the picture she gives of English life and English society of the period.

Messrs. Greening and Co. will issue this month "The Tangled Skein," a new novel by the Baroness Orczy, the author of the wonderfully successful "Scarlet Pimpernel." Among the other new novels in the same firm's list are "The Mascotte of Park Lane," by Lucas Cleeve; "Love the Criminal," by Harris Burland; and "The Dupe," by Gerald J. Biss.

Mr. Bertram Mitford, who has written several stirring stories of life in South Africa, tells of a rising of the blacks against the whites in his new novel, "The Black Hand and the White," to be shortly published by Mr. John Long. Trickling through the exciting incidents of the story is a love romance.

"Fräulein Schmidt and Mr. Anstruther: Being the Letters of an Independent Woman" is the title of a new volume by the author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden," which Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. are publishing this week.

Christian Science is dealt with in a new novel by Mr. E. F. Benson, entitled "The House of Defence," which Mr. Heinemann has in preparation.

In "Round About Wiltshire" Mr. A. G. Bradley gives the record of a recent summer's ramble in that county. He writes in his well-known allusive manner of matters historical and archæological, of the natural beauties of the county, its social and pastoral life, old customs and traditions; of the Downs, their white horses, chalk streams, and matchless pre-historic remains. The book, which Messrs. Methuen are publishing, will have a number of illustrations in colour by Mr. T. G. Gotch.

A new volume by Miss M. Betham-Edwards, entitled "Literary Rambles in France," is announced by Messrs. Constable and Co. Miss Betham-Edwards has an unrivalled knowledge of provincial France and is certain to prove a delightful and interesting guide.

Mr. Murray will publish immediately "The Life and Letters of Sir James Graham (1792-1861)," edited by Mr. C. S. Parker. It is the first life of that statesman, based on the family papers and documents, which has appeared.

Miss Marjorie Bowen's first book, "The Viper of Milan," enjoyed quite exceptional popularity, and the announcement of the appearance of a second novel from her pen, entitled "The Glen o' Weeping," has excited much interest. The new book—a story of the Glencoe massacre—is being published this week by Messrs. Alston Rivers.

Motoring does not seem to have checked the cult of the caravan—indeed, every summer an increasing number of people take to the road, gipsy-fashion, and the general verdict of those who have tried it is that it is a most delightful way of spending a holiday and seeing the country. Mr. Bertram Smith's book, "The Whole Art of Caravanning" (Longmans, Green and Co., 2s. 6d. net), not only confirms this impression, but contains much useful information for the guidance of intending caravanists.

"Richard Hooker," by the Very Rev. Vernon Staley, Provost of the Cathedral Church of St. Andrew, Inverness, is the first volume of the Great Churchmen Series which Messrs. Masters and Co. have just started. The price of these monographs, which are illustrated, is 3s. 6d. each.

Mr. Maurice Baring's "With the Russians in Manchuria" was one of the best books on the late war. In a new volume, "A Year in Russia," which Messrs. Methuen are about to issue, Mr. Baring gives the impressions of an impartial eye-witness who had the opportunity of mixing with Russians of all classes during that most eventful year in Russian history which followed the declaration of peace.

As a fitting commemoration of her stage Jubilee, Miss Ellen Terry—so she will always be known to her innumerable admirers, though she has now become Mrs. Carew—began last year the writing of her autobiography—a task in which her chief difficulty was due to the embarrassing abundance of her interesting experiences, which would easily have furnished material for many books. The work has now been completed, and it will first be published in the columns of M. A. P., commencing on June 6, under the title, "The Story of My Life."

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—The season proper has begun. The three signs and tokens are the opening of the opera-house, the opening of the Royal Academy, and the return of the King to England. The opera is quite as fashionable as ever, and the first nights beheld wonderful gatherings of beauty, dress, and jewels. There could scarcely be a better frame for lovely faces than the dark red house against which the light, filmy frocks of the hour find full relief. The Romney or Empire gown, with its soft folds and classical draping, is admirably suited for opera wear, much more so than satins and velvets. A poet or artist must delight in the sight of these artistically gowned women with their flashing jewels and the pastel tones of their draperies. It gives one an æsthetic pleasure to see them, their hair shining and perfectly arranged.

We heard "Hänsel und Gretel" for the first time, and loved it. For once, the libretto is as charming as the music. Bee did not care for the angels, but I liked them. It is just like a child's dream, and so is the witch's house, all made of different kinds of cakes.

The new exhibition at Earl's Court is both interesting and picturesque, even in the incomplete state in which it was opened on Saturday. It seems strange to have an exhibition not dominated by the Big Wheel, but on its site there are new and wonderful amusements, all relying on speed and "up-and-downness" for their attraction. All the side-shows promise well, and the "Old Japan" entertainment ought to be very popular just now. But these are the frivolities; there is much solid interest in the exhibits. Embroideries of every kind are shown, and the costumes that can be studied, both in cases and on the peasants who work or sing or dance in various parts of the exhibition, are varied and wonderful. We were very much interested in the demonstration of tobacco manufacture, tracing the leaf from its natural state to the completed cigarette. This is in the Servian section. The workers have fine faces, broad brows, pale olive skins, and straight, glossy, dark hair. In the same section is a demonstration of carpet-weaving. It is extraordinary to see how unerringly the weavers, who work by hand, plan out their pattern with different coloured wools long before the longer threads are woven to the same place.

The carved furniture here is delightful, and is adapted to practical bedroom purposes very cleverly. We saw a couch, too, covered in bright colours, which looked the acme of comfort. There are some very interesting sketches of the method of fishing employed in Servia, showing the shapes of the nets, and the fish entering them; and on the surface of the blue water little dark fishermen in long pointed boats, rather Japanese in effect. We liked these utilitarian sketches, quaint and naïve, better than the ambitious paintings in the art section. Under them hung a beautifully written framed placard headed: "Species of fiches fiched in the Danube."

In the Balkan Village there is an open café, at which one can have refreshment while watching groups of Bulgarian peasants dance and play on a neighbouring platform. The musicians, wearing baggy white trousers and embroidered zouaves, stand back to back in the middle, playing on violins and 'cello wild tunes of endless repetition. Round them the peasants, hand in hand, revolve in rings, first one way, then the other, the men wearing embroidered suits, the women with embroidered zouaves or else loose, Burmese-looking coats, over dark embroidered skirts. Beneath these, which are short, hang longer petticoats of pale gauze worked in silver and gold. The Orient tinges strongly the clothes of all these Eastern Europeans. We hope to go again and study the exhibition more closely, for only a hurried visit was possible on Saturday, the opening day.

One reads surprising things in the papers sometimes. For instance, the account of the fascinating Frenchwoman who ran away from her husband with another man and stole some money. Her husband went after her, regained her society for a few days, and, taking her crime on his own shoulders, was convicted of theft and imprisoned. What does the lady do next? She goes off with yet another man, and sues for divorce from her husband on the grounds that he has been convicted of theft!

It reminds me of a case I read in the papers years ago, where a husband of the working classes knocked his wife's eye out and shortly after kicked her because she had only one. What a rankling sense of bitter injustice the poor victims must feel in such cases.

The Park is lovely just now, in its freshness of green. The grass has in some lights that hint of blue that is so exquisite, and the baby leaves on the trees look all the fresher and brighter by contrast with the perfectly black stems and twigs, darkened by London smoke. The flowers, too, are in themselves quite beautiful; but they do not look quite happy set out in formal rows and ranged in order of colour as they are. Why not a little harmony with the character of flowers themselves? They do not grow exactly like each other, and no one ever saw two roses arranging themselves in mathematical order on the parent bush. A little carefully studied disorder would be much more effective. The Park gardeners give the idea that they would like to coerce the tulips, daffodils, hyacinths to grow by rule, and have an equal number of leaves on every side.

Down in the country the apple-blossom is showing abundance of pink folded in little close, rounded petals among the pale, soft bright green. The glory of the plum bloom is long over, and but a few of the pear trees have preserved their whiteness since the recent storms of wind and rain. The rose bushes are covered with buds, and very soon we shall have roses. Meanwhile the wallflower perfumes the air, and the bees begin their happy murmur in the apple trees. It is a lovely time, the Maytime. Why cannot we all enjoy it, far from towns and cities?

"There is great trade depression in riverside hotels." Thus a Thames Valley solicitor, giving evidence in a law case. And whose the fault? The hotel-keepers', and none other. If they make exorbitant charges, how can they expect customers? These heavy charges simply drive them away. It ought to be possible to have a moderate tariff and yet make a fair profit, with good management. Confronted with West-End restaurant prices for a menu that cannot compete with that of a West-End restaurant, the visitor eats his luncheon or dinner, pays his bill, and determines never to go again. Old-fashioned cookery à l'Anglaise is now so popular that it ought to be possible to please customers without engaging a very expensive chef. Shall we take a hotel and make our fortunes?

On Thursday, the 16th (next week) a matinée will be given at The Playhouse (by kind permission of Mr. Cyril Maude) in aid of the Girls' Realm cot in the Great Ormond-street Hospital for Children. It is under very distinguished patronage, including that of the Princess of Wales, the Princess Royal, and several of our duchesses. The Girls' Realm Guild of Service and Good Fellowship have worked hard for years for their cot, and have made £700 themselves without public appeal. They now want to complete their £1,000 for endowment for ever. The hospital is in dire need of funds, and wards will have to be closed if immediate help is not forthcoming. The performance begins at 2.30 on the 16th and includes the screen scene from the "School for Scandal," by Miss Winifred Emery, Mr. Fred Terry, Mr. Ben Webster, and Mr. Cyril Maude; "The Friend in the Garden," by E. F. Benson, with another first-rate cast, "Compromising Martha," and a French play acted by Miss Aimée Lowther and Mlle. Jolivet. There are several other attractions, so the performance ought to be a great success. I hope it will.

If you know any young mother who is worried about her infant child not thriving as it should do, recommend to her a little pamphlet called "Baby's Welfare," issued by Allen and Hanbury, 37, Lombard-street, E.C. It is full of the most valuable hints about the food and management of small babies, always such a responsibility to those in charge of them. The advice about minor ailments is so excellent that I wish the County Councils all over England would distribute the book free among inexperienced mothers of the class that cannot afford to get doctor's advice every time the child is ill. The chapter on general management should be posted up in every cottage. The value of air is inculcated, and equally the danger of draughts, and so on. The ignorance of young mothers about bringing up babies is simply appalling. School-board instruction could scarcely be expected to cover the subject, but one would imagine that the teaching there would at least open the minds of the children to the perception of their ignorance and to the reception of knowledge on general matters. A copy of "Baby's Welfare" will be sent post free on application as above.

The private view of the Royal Academy was a tremendous crush. It disturbed the traffic of Piccadilly for some hours. The people inside were far more interesting than the pictures, enthralling as some of the latter are. There were many artists and their wives and daughters, most of whom talked shop and criticised the pictures from the technical point of view. There were several actors and a few actresses. Other ingredients of the moving mass were clerics, politicians, members of Parliament (I caught sound of a glorious brogue I had once heard in the House!), legal luminaries, famous doctors, authors, and, above all, pretty women. Wherever one turned there was a pretty woman nicely dressed. Mr. Frank Richardson says that any woman who is not absolutely hideous can achieve the reputation for beauty if she only acts as though she were really pretty. He must mean a poise of the head that says, "Look at me," a glance of the eyes that also invites inspection, and in a way rewards it by a peculiar conscious softness; and a pose of the whole body that unmistakably carries the owner's impression that she is the centre of admiring eyes. I have seen all these things most successfully winning a place in the ranks of beauty. It is interesting to watch, but this conquering way needs one more qualification beyond those I have mentioned, viz., skill in choosing and wearing nice clothes, and the art of concealing that one is conscious of them.

I did not particularly notice this kind of pretty woman at the Private View. There were so many of the genuine sort. A lovely girl in white and pale green was immensely admired. I do not know who she was. A well-known authoress also wore white and pale green, and looked too handsome to be as clever as she is. Brains and good looks are not supposed to go together in our sex. They often do in the other.

There seemed to be an emulation as to who should wear the longest feather. A blue one hung about half a yard down its wearer's back. A grey one stood straight in the air and caused almost as much comment of a startled sort as Mrs. Brown Potter's portrait. A third feather was terracotta and green, the colours skilfully mingled and adorning a charming head. Many of us tried not to covet an Indian scarf, pale green of ground and any colours you like to mention in the border. I always compromise with such mean and envious promptings by saying I wish I had "one like it." I do not feel quite so wicked then and can admire the beauty of whatever it may happen to be. Isn't it a good plan? Or is it a specious self-deception?

I noticed some strange unions of colour in the crowd. A violently mauve hat was worn with a pink gown. Under a red gown peeped a petticoat of purple silk and lace. Rather nice was a mauve voile over bright blue silk and with a chené belt in the two colours deftly mingled. I saw a scarlet toque with a purple feather, and the contrast was strong enough to make me blink. Still more surprising was it to find, when I got near enough through the crowd, that the dress was in a tone of red that swore at that of the feather. It was an insult to take such an arrangement among the pictures.

There is a great sale on at Mortlock's and there are the chances of a lifetime in bargains of glass and china. If you do not mind a missing plate or dish, you can buy an incomplete service for a trifling sum. Don't you love good glass? There are beautiful sets for the table at very low prices during the sale. The white engraved with gold is so pretty, and the large, quaintly-shaped bowls for flowers look lovely on the dinner table, the water in them shining like diamonds. I like to see the graceful stalks of flowers through the glass, don't you? If you want to lay in a small store of wedding presents run up to town one day and we will spend an hour together in the Mortlock galleries.

One reason among many others, why I like Erasmic soap so much is because the dark sort is easily found in the bath, owing to its colour. Soap has a way of going off on its own just when it is wanted, and the paler varieties become invisible, so that one has to grope all round for them. The slipperiness of the article makes it annoyingly elusive, too, and I cannot bear wasting time looking for anything. Can you? In fact, I think some clever person ought to invent a way of stringing soap on a line so that it could simply be hauled in like an anchor when it has been lost sight of. Some American will probably do it some day.

H.R.H. Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, has promised to open the annual sale of the North Bucks Lace Association, which is to be held—by permission of Lord and Lady Battersea—at Surrey House, Marble Arch, on Tuesday and Wednesday next. The beautiful laces for sale have been made by cottagers in Bucks and Bedfordshire, and a demonstration of lace-making will be given, while in an annexe a loan collection of rare and historical laces will be shown.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—What a fraud May-day was, with regard to the ideas woven around it by tradition and the poets. We had most severe wintry weather, with gales that would have made short work of Maypoles, and rains and hails which would have washed away any May Queen and her crown. It was not a merry, but decidedly a mad, day, in which latter respect alone it fell in with the late Laureate's view of the occasion. Prose has had a decided triumph over poetry in sending May Queens out of fashion. How dismal would have been their coronations last week, their crowns those of sorrow rather than of joy. Only think of revellings on soaking village greens swept by glacial winds! And of the sorry attempt to wear faces of joy, whilst otherwise wearing bedraggled flower garlands, ribbons, and all sorts of summer finery. Nothing wants more rearrangement than do the traditions and "properties" at present appertaining to many of our festivals. For instance, how comfortable the Yule log, which is so frequently superfluous at our green Christmas times, would have been last week; May Queens might again come into fashion and have a really good time by its blazing glow. May would have some claims to be "merrie," with Christmas dances and jollifications round its Maypoles, set up in indoor comfort, warmth, and safety from the vigour and arctic severity of the weather.

The only consolation we had, under the circumstances, was a sorry one—that is, that most other countries, with more pretensions to climate than ours, were just as badly off, or even more so, than we were. We found the "something which does not displease us" in the adversities of others.

Last week was a quiet one in Dublin, and, indeed, in the whole of Ireland. We were all more or less waiting for this week, which may be "big with the Fate" of our part of the kingdom. Even we women who take no part in politics have to interest ourselves in them, when they intrude themselves into the innermost circle the immense importance of the unique superiority of Odol? While all other preparations for cleansing the mouth and teeth are effective only during the few moments of application, the antiseptic and refreshing power of Odol continues gently, but persistently for hours afterwards. Odol penetrates the interstices of the teeth and the mucous membrane of the mouth, to a certain extent impregnating them, and leaving an antiseptic deposit on the surface. In this manner a continuous antiseptic effect is secured, by means of which the whole oral cavity, to the minutest recesses, is completely freed from and protected against all fermenting processes and injurious bacteria. Owing to this characteristic, peculiar only to Odol, fermentation is absolutely arrested and the healthy condition of mouth and teeth assured.

Odol is used by dentists themselves.

of hearth and home, though, of course, we are a little inured to Home Rule Bills by this time, and have fallen into a way of taking them in the day's work. The metaphor, however, of the lull before the storm would be singularly inappropriate for the week, since never did wilder May winds blow, day and night. One fears that many who came across the water for the opening of our international exhibition must, like the Istrian traveller of very long ago, have found it "a wearisome labour to arrive at Ireland." Let us hope, however, that they may also find, like him, "there is no experience, however horrible, that does not contribute to some good end."

Lady Aberdeen's recovery was happily advanced enough to allow of her accompanying Lord Aberdeen to the opening ceremonial on Saturday last of the International Exhibition. The weather, fortunately—though, to say the least of it, still breezy—was fine and sunshiny, which was a fit, as well as an auspicious, omen. The scene inside the buildings was a gay and pretty one, the opening ceremonial short, and the music very effective. The Viceregal party arrived in three State carriages, with escorts. In addition to their Excellencies and their Viceregal officials, military and civilian, were the visitors, Lady Ormonde, Lady Annesley, Lady Constance Butler, and Sir Reginald Custance, who was in command of the part of the fleet then in Kingstown "Roads." The procession to the daïs was a pretty one, owing to the uniforms worn, which did not leave our sex to contribute all the brilliant effect. The Ulster King-at-Arms fulfilled his usual mission as a "thing of beauty" and ornament, and officially proclaimed the exhibition open, after the reading of the King's telegram and the address and short speeches. The wear of our sex on the occasion was mostly a wisely chosen one of unmitigated winter garments and furs. Wrapped in their comforts one felt amiably towards all the surroundings, and had a hopeful spirit for the future.

Lady Shaftesbury is to have the experience of receiving a silver cradle from the County Council of Belfast, in honour of the birth of her daughter lately at Belfast Castle, she being Lady Mayoress of the northern capital. Lady Grosvenor, her mother, has been paying her a visit.—Yours ever, CLARE.

I am seeking some nice recipes for you next week.—Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

DR. ALABONE'S TREATMENT.

The statements as to the wonderful success achieved by this method are amply authenticated by the incontrovertible evidence of patients and the Press, and therefore compel our earnest attention and force enquiry, proving that were the treatment other than willingly testified to by hundreds of grateful persons these statements could easily be refuted.

As showing the remarkably happy results following the adoption of this treatment, we print the following letters which have been written to the Christian World.

Sir,—It affords me sincere pleasure to testify to the very marked success of Dr. Alabone's treatment in some undoubted cases of tubercular disease of both lungs.

One lady in particular, whom I sent to London some five years ago to undergo Dr. Alabone's method of cure, is now in perfect health and is loud in his praise. Before she went under his care she had been pronounced "an utterly hopeless case" by two highly qualified medical men, both possessing an excellent reputation for accurate diagnosis.

Personally, I am so impressed with the value of his treatment that, if I were pronounced phthisical to-morrow, I would at once adopt it, and with full faith as to the result.—Faithfully yours, F.C.——, L.R.C.P., L.R.C.S.I.
Highbury.

Sir,—It having been my good fortune to meet several patients of Dr. Alabone, I feel bound to add my testimony as to the success of his treatment, I have seen cases pronounced "utterly incurable" by the highest chest specialists quite recover. I therefore feel it a duty to write, expressing any gratification and surprise at their recovery.—I am, yours, &c., L., M.R.C.S.Eng.

We would recommend those of our readers who may unfortunately be suffering in Consumption to write to Dr. Alabone for particulars of his treatment, which he has kindly consented to send on application.

* "The Cure of Consumption, Chronic Bronchitis, Asthma, and Catarrh," illustrated by numerous cases "pronounced incurable" by the most eminent physicians; 39th edition, 170th thousand, price 2s. 6d., post free of Author, Edwin W. Alabone, M.D.Phil., D.Sc., ex-M.R.C.S.Eng., Lynton House, Highbury-quadrant, London, N. By the same Author: "Testimonies of Patients, with Comments on the Open-Air Treatment," price 1s.

From East to West.

TWO GREAT CENTRES.

By A. DOUGLAS.

To-day we are nothing if not progressive. Nothing will serve us but that the maximum of advantage shall be obtained at the minimum of expenditure in time. Do we need anything, we must needs go to a centre, somewhere where a choice can be made, and where we are sure the article we desire can be obtained, if, indeed, we may not have set our minds on the unattainable. At the same time, we have not the least intention of foregoing one of the advantages which can be obtained anywhere else.

A live business firm recognises this demand and provides accordingly. Acting on this principle, the Hackney Furnishing Company have just opened extensive premises—93, 95, 97, and 99, Oxford-street—for the better accommodation and economy of time of their West-End customers, who have been a very growing number on their books, since the advantages of their enormous selection, expert judgment, low prices, and exceptionally favourable trading system have become generally known. At their new address the Hackney Furnishing Company, having during their thirty odd years' trading made Hackney a centre of the furnishing industry, and knowing that the more wealthy patrons have in many cases hesitated to go so far to see the goods they contemplated purchasing, have gone straight for the latest and undoubtedly most convenient centre for the same trade in the West End. There is now no need for the dweller in the West to go further than the bottom of Newman-street to receive the most courteous attention, the largest selection offered by any firm in the world, and the most fair terms possibly attainable; as there has been no need in the past for the dweller in the North or East to go further than Hackney. At both these establishments the firm undertake Furnishing for every one.

"Furnishing for everyone," the reader may remark, is a very bold proposition. To undertake to supply rich and poor alike is to do that which at first sight seems beyond the means of any ordinary firm. There is not merely the enormous variety of class in furniture, artistic, economical, and serviceable, but there is the necessity of meeting the varying financial positions of the would-be purchasers. For anyone to make such a boast, it must be essential that he possess a thoroughly efficient and enormous organisation, perfected through years of experience. The Hackney Furnishing Company, of which Mr. A. M. Stewart is the Founder and Managing Director, the originators of the system of deferred payments, make this assertion. At Hackney, their original home, they have over 6½ acres of showroom area, being one of the largest furnishing stores in the metropolis. Their new premises, Nos. 93, 95, 97, 99, Oxford-street, have been described as "the prettiest shops in London." The management has been entrusted to Mr. Michael Pearl, whose great reputation in the North is known to all. In these two establishments can be seen furniture fit to grace the most elegant mansion, and also furniture fit to withstand the hard and constant wear of the artisan's home. The whole are supplied at strictly moderate prices, either for cash or upon the Hackney Furnishing Company's Improved "Model" System.

In these go-ahead times it is wholly unnecessary for any middle-class home to be meanly furnished. The clerk or artisan can stock his home with artistic treasures such as his forefathers never dreamed of possessing. He can surround himself with the products of best workmanship—products which are the last word in artistic design, high quality, and durability.

When, some years ago, Mr. A. M. Stewart founded the Hackney Furnishing Company, it was looked upon by some in the light of a hazardous experiment, but the system he then inaugurated, and which is described by the whole Press as the "Model System," was destined to fill a public want.

By the Hackney Furnishing Company's system, the young man in a clerkship, or the warehouseman, enjoys the same terms of credit as those obtained by people in a much higher social position. He is not obliged to be content with an inferior article, one which will be a constant reproof to him, because that is the best his ready cash will run to.

No deposit is required. The prospective customer can drive in the firm's private motor or brougham to the magnificently appointed showrooms, and select at leisure from the largest and most artistic display of furniture in the Kingdom, and he has also the great advantage of Mr. Stewart's personal attention and advice—advice based upon many years' sound practical experience in the furnishing of houses of all classes. His purchases are then delivered to him, free of all charges, whether he resides in London, or miles away in the country. If he has not yet decided upon his place of residence, or for any other reason, the firm will store his goods for a period up to six months free.

The terms of payment are most advantageous—twenty pounds' worth of goods can be obtained on payments of eleven shillings per month, thirty pounds' worth for seventeen shillings, fifty pounds' worth for twenty-eight shillings per month, one hundred pounds' worth for forty-five shillings per month, five hundred pounds' worth for eleven pounds five shillings per month, and so on, in proportion. A free fire insurance policy is issued with all purchases, so that no loss by accident need be apprehended, whilst, by a system of life insurance, if the purchaser dies before completing the instalments the goods become the property of the widow or next-in-kin, without further payments. If a cash transaction is preferred, the purchaser enjoys a cash discount of ten per cent.

Their new premises in Oxford Street is a veritable treasure palace, a wonderful seven-storey building, replete with every modern contrivance for comfort and elegance.

Electric lifts convey the delighted visitor to floor after floor crammed with everything in furniture and home appointments the heart of man or woman can desire.

Great floods of dazzling light from splendid arch windows illumine a number of model rooms, each furnished with taste and elegance, price in all cases plainly marked. The feet of the visitor sink into rich pile carpets, upon which are arranged the finest quality Louis XVI. suites, Empress suites, embroidered suites, suites in oak, walnut, &c. Upon every wall hang the latest and best products of art and craft, in every nook and cranny some fresh marvel asserts itself. The keynote of the whole is absolute durability and expert workmanship. The customer can have any article taken almost to pieces if he so wish, to test the claims of the firm in this direction. A service of well-appointed motors is in attendance to convey purchasers to the new seven-floor West-end branch or the enormous parent warehouse at Hackney. One of the latest enterprises of this mammoth firm is house-reclaiming. You can buy an old dilapidated house, and hand it over to the care of Mr. Stewart. He will rebuild it for you, fit up electric light, and artistically furnish it to suit your every whim.

Write to-day to the Hackney Furnishing Co., Town Hall Buildings, Mare Street, Hackney, N.E., or to 93, 95, 97, and 99, Oxford Street, W., for the superbly illustrated catalogue, sent you post free. You will be astonished at its completeness. It would be practically impossible to name anything pertaining to the furnishing or decoration of a home which the firm do not stock, and of which they cannot offer a large selection. In fact, when you have paid them a visit, or, failing that, looked carefully through their catalogue, you will assuredly say, "Here, indeed, is Furnishing for Everyone."

England's Premier Mine consists of 40 acres situated in the Nipissing (Portage Bay) district of Cobalt, where the finds have been both numerous and rich. It has the same formation as the Nipissing Mine and other well-known properties in the same district.

Mr. Ralph W. Foster, Resident Consulting Engineer at Cobalt of Francis Cox and Co., Ltd., reported to them as follows on April 2nd:—"This property is ideally situated for development by tunnel work. . . . . The rich veins on the adjacent properties can readily be traced on to England's Premier, and I have no hesitation in saying that by vigorous work we ought within the next 90 days to make as good a showing as any of our rich neighbours. . . . I consider that you have every chance of a very quick return."

Mr. A. J. King, of Toronto, Canada, a well-known mining expert, who has just arrived in London, direct from Cobalt, Ontario, and who inspected England's Premier Mine, has brought with him some rich samples of ore showing native silver which he obtained on the property himself. He states that average, unselected assays of ore on the property run from 300 to 900 oz. of pure silver to the ton. He states further that he has no hesitation in saying this is one of the best prospects in the camp, and that in a few months it will be, like its rich neighbours, one of the most important producing mines in the Cobalt district.

The value of the ores in the Cobalt field are maintained at depth; in the opinion of the best Engineers in the camp the values will be maintained to a depth of 1,000ft. Two shafts have been sunk on England's Premier property. Considerable stripping on the surface has also been done, and seven rich veins have already been located. The work already done has shown splendid results, and arrangements have already been made to erect the necessary machinery and plant to carry on operations with all possible speed. On the adjoining property assays show 3,000oz. of silver to the ton; equally good results may be looked for from England's Premier Mine, and dividends may confidently be expected during the present season. The average cost of mining in the Cobalt district does not exceed 10 per cent. of the values won, and in many cases is much less.

At the present time there are 30 mines in the Cobalt district shipping rich ore to the smelters, and 25 more mines have purchased machinery for the active development of their properties.

England's Premier shares are now dealt in on the London Stock Exchange, and application will at once be made for a settlement.

Intending purchasers should apply to their own Stockbrokers, or Messrs. Buckler & Norman, 4, Throgmorton Avenue, London, E.C., or to C. S. Jarvis, the Secretary of the Company, Trafalgar Buildings, Northumberland Avenue, London, W.C.

THE STATUTORY MEETING of this Company was held at their registered offices, 2 Broad-street-place, on April 30.

On the motion of Mr. JAMES T. T. PAXTON, seconded by Mr. C. HENRY McEUEN, Mr. Thomas Gilbert Scott was voted to the chair.

The CHAIRMAN.—Gentlemen, I call upon the secretary to read the notice convening the meeting and the auditors' certified report.

The SECRETARY (Mr. C. D. Comrie) accordingly read the notice and the report of Messrs. Futcher, Head, and Co., chartered accountants.

The CHAIRMAN then said:—Gentlemen, I beg to ask you to allow me to trespass on your time to a greater extent than is usual at a statutory meeting, because my co-directors and I think the shareholders may be glad to learn something of the history of their Company and to hear full particulars of the properties and undertaking in which they have invested. Before commencing I would like to explain to the shareholders that in taking the chair to-day I am what I may describe as an unwilling impostor, because owing to one director having only lately joined the Board, and another having been compelled to go abroad for some weeks, we have not at present selected our chairman; and as I very reluctantly undertook this duty at somewhat short notice, I trust you will grant me a very ample indulgence. The Company was registered on January 31, 1907, with a capital of £300,000 in £1 shares; 125,000 shares have been allotted to cash subscribers, 125,000 are to be allotted as fully paid to the vendors, and the remaining 50,000 shares are under option at a price of £2 per share. The purchase price payable by the Company is £200,000, as to £75,000 in cash (provided out of the present issue of £125,000) and as to £125,000 in fully paid shares. This provides for the present a working capital for the Company's general purposes of roughly £50,000, and when the option over the unissued 50,000 shares at £2 per share is exercised, the Company will have £150,000 at its command. As you will see, the auditors' certified account, submitted to this meeting, shows that the sum of £30,582 payable in respect of the 5s. called up on the 125,000 shares has been received. The balance will be payable—5s. on June 3, 5s. on July 8, and 5s. on September 2 next. The date fixed for the completion of the purchase is July 25.

THE CLONCURRY RAILWAY.

Before passing on to our own properties, it is perhaps hardly necessary for me to allude generally to the Cloncurry district as likely to become a great copper-producing centre of the future. Directly the Queensland Government finally settled to extend the railway from Richmond to Cloncurry, a distance of some 180 miles, a great activity sprang up, with the result that far more information on the subject has been forthcoming, and it is apparent from reliable reports that the development of this district has been simply lying dormant till the arrival of the railway became a certainty. I think a statement in a report by Dr. R. Logan Jack, late Government Geologist of Queensland, made in 1901, when he believed a scheme to build a railway to Cloncurry from the north was about to be carried out, expresses the opinion held for years past by every one qualified to judge. He says:—"It is my firm conviction that few of the greatest of known mining fields, before they were opened, presented a more promising outlook than does the Cloncurry district. Fresh discoveries have been made from year to year, even though the prospectors knew that their only hope lay in railway extension. The railway was bound to come. Only political considerations and the jealousies of contending interests have prevented its coming sooner." Now, gentlemen, I cannot yet say that the railway actually has come, but our latest information from Queensland is that the construction of the railway is being pushed on at a great pace, and that it will probably be in Cloncurry by the end of the year, when transport of railway material for extension of our properties will be possible. The North Queensland Railway Company have obtained tramway leases and intend connecting the various mines with the Government railways at Cloncurry.

PROPERTIES ACQUIRED.

To pass on to our own possessions, we own eight freehold properties known locally as Malbon, Argylla, Rainbow, Chinaman, Diagonal, Yamamilla, Crusada, and Dobbins, containing an area of about 378 acres; we also have a third of the shares of the Mountain Home Copper Co. (Limited), of Queensland, owning an area of some 600 acres, and a half interest in Sutherlands selection of 40 acres at Cabbage Tree Creek. These were all purchased about 25 years ago by Mr. Archibald Coats, of Paisley, and the Australian Copper Syndicate, of Glasgow, in which Mr. Coats also holds a large interest. I may mention that Mr. Coats is largely interested in this Company, and one of our biggest shareholders. I wish to draw particular attention to the fact that our properties are all freeholds granted by the Government with none of the onerous labour conditions attached to a mineral lease. The Queensland Government for about the last 20 years have refused to grant any more mining freeholds, and it has only been possible to obtain mineral land on lease under stringent conditions which often prove exceedingly inconvenient and expensive. In this respect we have a great advantage, especially as we own a large area of mining land, for we shall be free to start work on some properties and suspend it on others entirely at our own discretion. Mr. Coats and the Australian Copper Syndicate expended a considerable sum of money many years ago in purchasing these properties, believing that when a railway was constructed they would become very valuable; for in spite of the fact that the land was known to contain a quantity of copper ore of very high percentage, it was impossible to carry on mining at a profit till the railway arrived, owing to the great distance from the coast.

THE MALBON AND ARGYLLA MINES.

Acting on the advice of our managing engineers, we are at present confining our attention to developing the Malbon and Argylla. Both these properties are reported to contain large and valuable lodes, and some preliminary work has already been done in opening them. In the Malbon, when visited in 1903 by Mr. Stewart, of Messrs. Alex. Hill and Stewart, a shaft about 25 ft. deep had exposed a small lode of solid copper glance ore, widening from 2 ft. at the surface, where red oxide and carbonate were found in the outcrop, to 3 ft. 7 in. of glance at the bottom of the shaft. An assay of glance at the bottom of the shaft yielded a result of 51 per cent. copper. Mr. Stewart, who reported on many properties in the neighbourhood, said, "This is the best defined and highest grade lode visited in the district, which, although somewhat narrow at surface, shows good prospects of becoming much wider in depth." In addition to this lode we have on the Malbon a second and apparently larger one outcropping almost continuously; the outcrop merely shows about 1 ft. 6 in. of carbonate and oxide ores, but a trench has exposed 7 ft. 2 in. of 33 per cent. ore in a lode of a total width of 11 ft. This mine sent to the Wallaroo Smelting Works some time ago 80 tons, averaging 39·4 per cent. copper, 4 dwts. gold, and 2 oz. 4 dwts. silver. Various parcels have been sent away since of about equal value, and at the present time a parcel is at the smelting works which is expected to yield a return equal to that already referred to. The Argylla mine is described by Dr. R. Logan Jack in a report taken from a Queensland Parliamentary Paper as follows:—"The Argylla mine is a wide belt of copper bearing country. The dominant feature of the belt is a wide reef of rather open and friable quartz, standing up as a crest on a hill-top for about three-eighths of a mile, and nearly 80 ft. above the general level of the slate country. The western side of the quartz reef at its north end is stained with carbonate of copper, its numerous caverns being conspicuous from a long distance, owing to their bright green colouring. Traced to the south the whole hill is seen to be a belt of copper lodes, generally running parallel to the dominant quartz reef. We saw a good deal of green carbonate of copper, often radiated and fibrous, and of the highest possible percentage. We could knock out, and pick up, on the hillside, or in the gullies, heavy boulders of red oxide of copper and gray ore."

DR. J. R. M. ROBERTSON'S REPORT.

Dr. J. R. M. Robertson, who was specially engaged by Mr. Coats to examine these properties, speaking of the Argylla in his report, says:—"This is, to all appearance, the most valuable copper freehold discovered. The surface outcrops are the thickest, richest, and longest yet seen. The main body of the lode, over 500 yards in length, is composed of a wall of string red oxide, possibly averaging 45 per cent. The largest lumps of copper ore, now in Helvingrove Museum, were blasted by myself out of this part of the lode. The walls of the lode are defined and smooth, and intersects the greywacke slates. Branching off the main lode at various angles are strong carbonate lodes. The main lode is defined over a length of 500 yards. Towards the southern end the lode is 12 ft. thick, and rests against capel. Beyond this it has not been prospected. A few feet north 10 ft. thick of solid red oxide is exposed, but the further thickness has not been ascertained; 100 ft. north it is equally strong. For 350 ft. it shows at intervals strong solid masses of ore. At this point the lode is 14 ft. thick, of which 7·6 is red oxide, the balance gossan tile ores and carbonates. The red oxides will average 45 per cent. Towards the north a large branch from the N.E. joins it. North of this the lode apparently expands, but much labour is required to prove its character. I know of no mine that gives such evidence of value. No work has been done to prove the character or extent of these rich ores in depth. For a space of 30 yards wide solid capel, which may merge into copper or copper ores, intersect the slate and suggest quarrying or open face workings."

THE COMPANY'S OTHER PROPERTIES.

As to the remaining properties, the following brief extracts from Dr. Robertson's report may be of interest, as indicating the favourable opinion expressed concerning them:—"The Chinaman.—The lode has been opened over a space of 350 yards. About 30 tons of 12 per cent. ore is on the surface. The lode has a promising appearance, but requires prospection. The Diagonal.—One of the lodes 3 ft. thick has been exposed, and from it 8 tons of 18 per cent. ore (estimated) have been taken. The Rainbow.—A strong lode can be traced on this for a distance of 200 yards. A shaft, 16 ft. deep, exposes a lode of 5 ft. thick, carrying pockets of rich ores I estimate at 50 per cent. Along this lode capel, a recognised favourable index of copper, is seen. The Yamamilla.—Enormous blocks of carbonates and oxides have rolled down from the outcrop, which at its highest part measures 15 ft. 6 in. thick. The gangue is quartz. Evidently large quantities of good ore—say 20 per cent. to 25 per cent. quality—could easily be obtained, while its position lends itself to easy adits into the lode from the north. No mining work has been done in this selection. Cabbage Tree Creek.—Strings and lodes of copper can be traced, and have been exposed in trenches over a distance of 200 yards. The ores are liver coloured and red oxides, but further work is necessary before positive opinions of its value can be offered. The Crusader.—The lode is very strong, and intersects a tumbled mass of tilted slates, grey gossan, and joints filled with silicate of copper. A shallow cutting reveals solid ore for 10 ft. or 12 ft., intermixed with gossan. Here the lode appears to be 30 ft. thick, if not more. To the south its width appears to be 54 ft. For 180 ft. every foot shows copper ore, and from this point it tapers off. Much thoughtful prospecting is required to prove the value of this deposit, but in doing so very large quantities of rich ore will be gotten. The prospects of a large deposit of rich ore are very bright. Dobbins.—The lode is solid, and varies between 6 ft., 10 ft., and 16 ft. thickness. To the north the lode divides, but no work has been done to trace the branches or to prove continuity in depth. From several open cuts over the course of the lode possible 100 tons of high-grade ore has been taken, the major portion of which is still on the ground. The quality will average 35 per cent. I hold a very high estimate of the value of this lode. It unquestionably contains very large quantities of high-grade ore."

THE MANAGEMENT AND PRESENT OPERATIONS.

I think most of the shareholders are aware that we have engaged Messrs. Alex. Hill and Stewart to act as our consulting and managing engineers, and I need hardly say we have absolute confidence in their ability to develop our properties with the utmost skill. Mr. Hill is now at Cloncurry, and will inspect the whole of the Company's properties, with a view of advising the directors as to future operations. Contracts have already been let for sinking a vertical shaft 150 ft. on the Malbon, from which the lodes will be worked, and on the Argylla for an incline shaft on the red oxide lode, and a vertical one on the malachite lode. Also a contract has been let for boring 2,500 ft. with a diamond drill on this property, so that the ore bodies may be quickly located at depth. We have asked Dr. R. Logan Jack to visit our properties and report to the board. Dr. Logan Jack was for many years geologist to the Queensland Government, and his opinions on mining matters carry very great weight in the Commonwealth. So much has been said lately in the Press on the probable production of copper in the future and the market outlook, that I do not consider it necessary for me to touch on this subject. Whatever may be the course of the copper market during the next few years, I think we are more than justified in pushing on the development of our properties with the greatest possible despatch. The experts who have examined our properties, extracts from whose reports I have read to you to-day, seem to be unanimous as to the great value of many of the lodes already exposed, and I think the shareholders will agree with me in considering our prospects of success exceedingly bright. Gentlemen, I have nothing more to add, except to thank you very much for your kind attention. (Cheers.)

Mr. TURNER.—Gentlemen, I desire to move a vote of thanks to the chairman for so ably presiding to-day, and in doing so I would move also that the directors be requested to see that a complete report of this meeting be published, so that the shareholders may always have by them the details which have been so ably and so lucidly put before them by the chairman to-day. Perhaps some one will kindly second that.

Mr. GILL: I beg to do so.

Mr. TURNER put the motion to the meeting, and it was carried unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN.—Thank you very much. As a matter of fact, we had already had Mr. Turner's suggestion made to us, and I think the directors have practically settled that we will publish a report of the meeting and circulate it among the shareholders.

The proceedings then terminated.

NEW RIETFONTEIN ESTATE GOLD MINES, LIMITED.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTORS, submitted at the Tenth Ordinary General Meeting of Shareholders, convened for 27th March, 1907, in the Board Room, Consolidated Building, corner of Fox and Harrison Streets, Johannesburg.

TO THE SHAREHOLDERS,

Gentlemen.—Your Directors have pleasure in submitting to you their report, together with the reports of the Consulting Engineer and Manager, and the Audited Balance Sheet and Profit and Loss Accounts for the year ended 31st August, 1906, together with Supplementary Accounts to 31st December, 1906.

CAPITAL.—The Capital of the Company remains as last reported, viz.: £625,000 in 625,000 shares of £1 each, 610,084 of which are issued and 14,916 in reserve.

PROPERTY.—Your property comprises the following:—

(a) Mynpachts Nos. 211, 212, 213, in extent 198 morgen, 87 sq. roods, equal to 285.3288 claims. (b) 408.8174 claims held under 448 licenses. (c) 60 Vergunning Claims. (d) 2 Mining Stands. (e) 2 Water-rights. (f) Freehold of three portions of the Farm Rietfontein, No. 145, District of Heidelberg, together in extent 1,981 morgen, 268 sq. roods, or 4,193.82 English acres, including a piece of ground containing a plantation, in extent 168 morgen, 127 sq. roods. (g) Freehold portion of Farm Witkopje, No. 157, in extent 45 morgen, 83 sq. roods, including Mynpacht No. 529, in extent 3 morgen, 283 sq. roods.

During the year a block of claims, equal to 8.6692 claims, which was open ground, was pegged on behalf of the Company, it being considered advisable to acquire the block. The claims are held under 10 licenses. The Property Account, however, remains as before, nothing having been debited to this account for the claims acquired.

ACCOUNTS.—The Balance Sheet shows that a further sum of £181,482 16s. 10d. was expended during the year on new equipment and additions, the various heads under which the expenditure was made being detailed in the statement presented. The Profit and Loss Account is divided into two sections, the first showing a profit on the year's working of £105,370 14s. 3d., and the second section showing the two dividends paid during the year, and sundry other expenditure and revenue.

The Balance Sheet may be summarised as follows:—

MINE. The year's working and the results obtained are fully reviewed in the reports of the Consulting Engineer and Manager, and in the schedules accompanying them. The full new mill of 120 stamps was started near the end of August, 1906, and is running well, but, as the requisite staff of unskilled labourers was not obtainable earlier, the average number at work during the year was only 66.45 stamps. The re-equipment of the mine is now entirely completed, with the exception of the railway siding in course of construction.

DEVELOPMENT.—88,680 tons have been added to the estimated ore reserves, which now stand at 382,267 tons. It will be noted from the Accounts that the amount of £125,513 15s. 1d., which, at the end of your financial year, stood to the debit of the Ore Reserves Account, has now been written down to £57,340, the latter amount representing the re-valuation at the rate of 3s. per ton. This course was decided upon by your Directors after a careful consideration of the matter with the Consulting Engineer.

DIRECTORS.—In accordance with the Articles of Association, all the Directors, viz.: Messrs. H. F. Strange, S. B. Joel, H. A. Rogers, J. Friedlander, E. Brayshaw, C. Marx, and J. Munro retire, but are eligible and offer themselves for re-election.

AUDITORS.—Messrs. John Moon and Henry Hains retire. You are asked to appoint Auditors for the ensuing year, and to fix the remuneration for the past audit.

LETTERS FROM CELEBRITIES.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET ON NERVOUSNESS.

"Industrial Farm Colony,
"Duxhurst,
"April, 1907.

"Dear Friend,—Your letter is one of many which I constantly receive begging me to tell of something which can help to restore tired nerves and over-worn strength, and you ask me to do so because I come in contact with so many who for these very reasons fail in the race of life, having sought the wrong remedy for such loss of nerve-power.

"The description which you give me of your difficulty scarcely varies from that of which I am so often told. Work has become a drudgery, and life a heavy thing. You tell me that you go to bed feeling tired, and that you wake in the morning almost equally tired, that your food is distasteful to you, and that little things which used to sit lightly upon you have become heavy burdens; that even pleasure is toil. I know you have worked hard through many years, and have had much mental strain. This may in a measure account for your weakness, which is not brought about by any condition of actual disease, but which seems to arise from an even greater trouble—namely, that your nerve-force is seriously overspent.

"It is important to understand that in these days of worry and over-excitement, the over-work (mental and physical) to which most of us are subject calls forth an undue expenditure of strength, and that to recuperate the vigour we have lost we must consider what sort of food or remedy we require.

"Of course, the whole question of proper nourishment requires much thought and experience. Many forms of food and many restoratives are recommended, but having had to do with a great many people who have impaired their digestive organs and whose nerve-power has been seriously undermined, I do not think that I have come across anything which I believe a more suitable nutrient for all forms of weakness than Sanatogen. I do not know if you have tried it, but it seems to me, under the conditions such as you have described, an ideal preparation, because it provides a valuable tonic-food in the most suitable form. It consists, I believe, in the nourishing element of pure cows' milk, incorporated with which is a special nerve-tonic containing phosphorus. It has an invigorating power on worn-out nerves, and gives tone to exhausted tissues to a surprising extent. The feeblest system and the poorest digestive organs are able to assimilate it when they can really touch little else. I am strongly of opinion that you cannot do better than begin a course of Sanatogen if you wish to regain your strength.

"Sanatogen undoubtedly restores sleep and invigorates the nerves, and it braces the patient to health, for I have noticed that with the restoration of the digestive organs the mind becomes more quickly active, and work, both mental and physical, becomes more easy, and the freshness and keenness which such people have lost (apparently altogether) return gradually, and bring with them an enjoyment of life and a feeling of hopefulness not hitherto experienced.

"When the body is subjected to a course of Sanatogen the blood condition improves, the skin assumes a more healthy colour, the invigorated nerves are braced to a more healthy tone, and the whole human machinery is made fit for exercise and work and for fulfilling its functions in the most perfect manner. . . . ."

OUR PUZZLES.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Building, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on postcards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand, whilst in the case of new Competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,468.

This has been a very difficult Competition to judge, owing to the fact that the two conditions of "distinguished literary characters" and "intelligible English" have been interpreted by many competitors on the most elastic principles.

After careful deliberation I have decided to divide the Prize equally between WHIG and BUSY BEE, whose paragraphs were printed in TRUTH of April 3rd last.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,469.

This award is unavoidably held over to next week.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,477.

I propose to set a puzzle which will appeal not only to my sporting competitors, but also to many others, who, though not usually taking much notice of horse-racing, probably feel some interest in the great annual struggle for the "Blue Riband of the Turf," now so near at hand.

To be explicit, I am this week offering the usual Prize of Two Guineas to that competitor who shall prove most successful in NAMING, IN THEIR PROPER ORDER, THE 1ST, 2ND AND 3RD HORSES IN THE FORTHCOMING DERBY.

I may add that the scores made by competitors will be calculated on the following basis:—

Two marks will be awarded for the correct winner and one mark each for the correct 2nd and 3rd horses; while half a mark will be awarded for any horse correctly given among the first three, but given in its wrong order.

The Prize will go to that competitor who, on this basis, gains the highest marks.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i.) No Competitor must send in more than one Derby forecast.
(ii.) All Derby forecasts must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, May 20, at latest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of THE RASCAL, winner of one-third of TRUTH Prize No. 1,465, is Frederick J. White, Esq., 55, Kelmscott Road, Wandsworth Common, S.W.

THE RASCAL.—Although I do not usually discuss Prize awards, yet I will make an exception in the present instance, as the point at issue is one of fact rather than one of opinion. RAM'S forecast was adjudged better than yours by half a point for the reason that while you were nearer the official time by a few seconds, you were still a good way out; whereas in the relative position of the boats at Barnes Bridge (the other point of discrepancy between you) he gave the precise distance, viz., six lengths. Is it possible that you have been misled by the fact that some papers reported the margin between the boats at Barnes Bridge as five clear lengths, which, of course, represent six actual lengths? In reply to your other query: Winners of part of a Prize are still qualified to win part of a Prize, to an amount not exceeding the difference between the sum they have won and the full sum of Two Guineas. Thus you are still qualified up to £1 8s.

MINOS.—Your inscription was duly signed.

GLADIATOR.—Many thanks for your obliging suggestion, which I think may come in useful later on.

STANDIAN.—Thanks for your letter, with interesting particulars of Clive's childhood, which I do not remember to have seen elsewhere.

RIMABEL.—Possibly we may be able to have a non-initial alliterative Puzzle at some future date; though I doubt whether it might not be too subtle for the average competitor.

AUTOLYCUS.—I much regret that your solution of TRUTH Puzzle No. 1,472 was received too late for inclusion.

UNSIGNED.—I hope this may catch the eye of the competitor whose answer to Puzzle No. 1,472 is printed first of those immediately below. The answer was type-written and bore no signature. I shall be obliged if the writer will communicate with me, rectifying this omission.

DISGUST.—The Editor has handed me your letter in which you take exception to two of the poems recently printed in our last "Special Foreign" competition. I may remind you that our Puzzle competitors are at liberty to express any opinions they please, political or otherwise, provided they do not transgress the laws of decency or morality. But, at the same time, it is distinctly understood that such opinions must only be taken for what they are, viz., the private opinions of individual competitors—and not as by any means bearing the cachet of the Editorial assent. Personally, I frequently find myself in disagreement with the views expressed by my competitors; but, as an impartial Puzzle Editor, I do not, on that account, exclude them from our Puzzle columns; which, as I have already said, are open to persons of every shade of opinion. Having thus made clear to you the general principle, I have only to add that any discussion of your detailed criticisms would be superfluous.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

ANSWERS TO THE QUESTION: "IS THE ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER DESIRABLE?"

No. The primary object of punishment is to deter. There is no doubt that the death penalty is feared more than any other. There can, moreover, be no doubt that murder deserves death. If then the death penalty is the greatest deterrent, and if it is deserved, why should it be abolished? Death is also the most effective manner of protecting society from a repetition of the crime. Under the present system, extenuating circumstances may produce a reprieve, but the abolition of capital punishment would prevent the execution of men for whose brutal acts even death is an inadequate punishment.—Unsigned.

No. 1. Capital punishment was ordered under the Mosaic Law (Exod. xxi., 12), and recognised in the New Dispensation by St. Paul (Rom. xiii. 4). Wherever capital punishment has been abolished the usual result has been an increase of murder. 2. A criminal, knowing he is about to die, is more likely to seriously consider and repent of his crime than one to whom death seems distant. 4. The sanctity of human life is diminished if any penalty save the greatest is thought sufficient punishment for one who wilfully destroys a life.—Pedro.

Yes. Because it is at least doubtful whether the death penalty is sanctioned by Divine authority. Because the experience of those countries where it has been abolished suggests that life imprisonment is just as efficacious a deterrent. Because, if a miscarriage of justice takes place by the execution of an innocent person, the law can make no reparation. Because, apart from humanitarian sentimentalists, educated public opinion favours the reform.—Shelmerdin.

No. Because Almighty God gave this law to Moses: "The murderer shall surely be put to death." (Numbers xxxv., 16.) And because this was confirmed by Christ when He said: "One jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law."—A. P.

No. There are cases where the dread of capital punishment is the only deterrent to a potential murderer, especially where revenge is the primary motive. But capital punishment should be reserved for murderers whose crime has been carefully planned and carried out with callous deliberation. When a murder is unpremeditated, or committed in a fit of anger, or as the result of extreme provocation, capital punishment should not be enforced. The question is full of intricacies, and the ultimate tribunal is "vox populi," which is generally wise and just.—Strabus.

No. He who commits murder (and especially if he makes his crime worse by brutality) does not deserve to be let off too lightly. The world is better rid of such an inhuman monster. Leniency in punishment would naturally tend to increase crime. Capital punishment is the only penalty meet for him who takes another's life. In exceptional cases the sentence should be commuted to penal servitude for life, as at present, but every reason for a decision should be carefully considered. A reprieve should not be granted merely to satisfy the clamour of a few tender hearted but misguided sentimentalists.—Cherrypicker.

Yes. Because there is always the danger of committing an irreparable act of injustice by taking away the life of a person who may be really innocent, and who, if merely sentenced to penal servitude for life, could at any time be restored to liberty on proof of his or her innocence being forthcoming. Imprisonment for life would surely be as severe a punishment as immediate death, for the prisoner, if guilty, would have to suffer the lifelong torments of an accusing conscience. Besides, capital punishment does not effect the true object of all punishment—the reformation of the criminal.—Belfastiensis.

No. All murderers are either mad or extremely vicious, consequently they can be no comfort or pleasure to their friends or relations by still remaining in this world; and they cannot be set at liberty, so they are no use; and why should the country be burdened with the expense of keeping them in a living death? Providing they are given the opportunity of repenting by religious instruction, the sooner they are out of the world the better for everybody.—Dagmar.

No. While living in Italy, I have been threatened with the knife, being reminded by the man that in Italy they don't hang for murder as in England. Several years afterwards many cases occurred in the Italian army of officers being murdered by soldiers. The death penalty was temporarily restored, and two men shot for the crime, after which the murders entirely ceased. I believe that the death penalty is the best deterrent against murder, and that, although brutal and repulsive, it is really kinder to the criminal than a life-long imprisonment, which is only a prolonged torture.—Almaviva.

Yes. "I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, therefore turn yourselves and live ye," is the Church's teaching in the "Special office for attempt at suicide." We have passed from the days of belief that death by order of the State spiritually cancels crime, and know too little of its mystery to take a responsibility which hurries the murderer after his victim. A life sentence protects the community, and leaves the greater issues of the soul to the mercy and judgment of the God who gave it.—Munster Girl.

No. And firstly on the plea of humanity, for the only adequate substitute is real lifelong imprisonment, life cut off from all love, hope, liberty, and pleasure which is torture; yet milder punishment must inevitably cheapen life. Concerning the fear of taking innocent lives, it is surely better that few innocent should suffer than that many guilty should survive to do other foul deeds? It is laid down in the Holy Writ, demanded by the principles of justice, and required for the welfare of the community, that for the wilful taking of a life a life must be the penalty.—Oiseau.

Yes. Insanity does not merit death, therefore, murder, being an insane act, should come under the same category and be punishable by confinement (imprisonment for life. This, while adequately fulfilling the purposes of the capital sentence (punishment, prevention, and example), has the additional virtue of being revocable in a miscarriage of justice, while capital punishment places its victim beyond recall, thus sparing the condemning judge and jury the agony they must experience at discovering that they have condemned the innocent for the guilty. It, therefore, deserves adoption even on the principle of sparing many guilty to avoid sacrificing a few innocent.—Scrutator.

No. Emphatically no! Two reasons will suffice to support this apparently inhuman conclusion. Firstly, murder would undoubtedly become more rampant in all cases, especially in murders of specific types, such as those where the culprit has lost all interest in his own life, and those actuated by sheer revenge or in an hour of passion. Secondly, the abolitionists desire it for humanity's sake, but the idea derides itself, as just as murder would increase there would be a proportionate increase of inhumanity. As the idea of the policeman minimises robbery, so must the idea of the scaffold minimise murder.—Nero.

No. For premeditated and deliberate murder there is no adequate punishment but death. An overwhelming majority of murderers are shedders of innocent blood, and this no earthly judge has a right to excuse or pardon. After a fair trial, the convicted criminal (unlike the victim, hurried out of the world in a moment) has time given for preparation and repentance. Every palliation—passion, drunkenness, or provocation—is considered. Outside these comes capital punishment. Long may it come, for the safety of people's lives.—H.

Yes. The extreme penalty of the law is against reason and humanity. It supplies no correction. As the means of prevention or reformation it is a failure. The real motive is to strike terror and arrest the criminal in his evil designs. This is not effective. The good old days of Tyburn and Newgate are full of the most powerful illustrations, in opposition to executions. It was like a heroic period of public rejoicing, and raised crops of assassins, young and old, to be hanged one day. The present time affords no security for the relief of society from crime.—Sphinx.

No. Dread of death being the greatest of all human fears, the death penalty, properly considered as a warning to mankind rather than as a punishment of the offender—is the strongest imaginable deterrent to the commission of premeditated murder. "Murders," it is argued, "do occur despite the death penalty, therefore capital punishment does not deter, is merely vindictive, and is useless." Such an argument leaves out of account the murders that are not committed, and that would be committed, by those who, willing yet afraid to strike, would, but for the death penalty, not scruple to take human life!—Quilp.

Yes. Hanging has never reformed people. Neither morals, manners, nor persons have been purified. Wild temper and ferocity of nature have not been restrained. Crimes have been committed, wholesale, in the shadow of the gallows. It has no merit for crushing, through fear, the evil designs of the ill-adjusted part of humanity. In former days he was a hero, no matter about his crimes, if he died with Spartan courage in sight of the mobs. As long as man remains the animal creature that he is, his annals will be stained with crimes, more or less, in his struggle. —Crank.

No. To abolish it would be tantamount to removing one of the safeguards of society. Of course, it is founded on the divine law, Gen. IX., 6, and the universal exemption from the death penalty was soon proved to be a failure in France, and murders were more than doubled. Yet the death sentence should be very carefully considered, and the jury's recommendation, especially if supported by the judge, should carry great weight. The final decision should hardly be left to the Home Secretary, who may be biassed by popular feeling, but rather to a higher court of judicature. —Simplex.

Yes. The rope, the guillotine, the electric chair fail in their mission to subdue murderous deeds. Criminals still flourish. Death has no terrors for them. The punishment in view is endowed, as it appears, with a halo of romance. Look at the civilised nations of the earth, with their horrible and appalling records of crime, where the fatal pendulum is ever on the swing. Incarceration for life, with years of solitary confinement. This would be real chastisement; and would, when its terrible severity became known, result in reformation, and enormous reduction in the sacrifice of life. Reason would then prevail. —Mary.

Yes. Because in most murder cases the evidence is circumstantial, and there is a great risk of innocent persons being convicted. Capital punishment allows of no opportunity of establishing innocence which time might afford. All punishment should have as its object "reformation." Capital punishment, of necessity, renders this impossible. Penal servitude would be a greater deterrent to a person so constituted as to be capable of taking away the life of his fellow. In the last analysis, capital punishment tends to lessen the value of human life.—Mid-Ulster.

1. No. 2. Because it is the Mosaic rule: "Whoso sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." 3. Because there is no security of life, and any one with a grievance, fancied or real, can take the law in his own hands. 4. Because, as in the case of Mr. Whiteley's murderer, public sentiment through the daily press overrides the laws of England. 5. If capital punishment is to be done away, let Parliament do so, but as the law is at present, the law should be enforced.—Dorset.

No. It has been practically tried. About fifty years ago it was almost an established precedent to bring in a verdict of insanity. Consequently, murder became a popular recreation. When they began hanging again, murder went out of fashion. Every man is mad at the moment he commits unlawful homicide. The question to decide is, Was it culpable or invincible insanity? —Libra.

Yes; on the ground that it is notorious innocent men have been hanged for crimes which they never committed. In these cases, had the sentence been one of penal servitude for life, some sort of reparation could have been made for what was nothing more or less than judicial murder.

I have also in mind TRUTH'S "Queer Story," "The Hanging of Martin Dadso," which was founded on one of these deplorable cases. Casaio.

All men are cowards, more or less. Fear is calculated to be deterrent alike in the mind of the criminal and the virtuous. There is no condition so wretched which most men will not accept provided they may live. The death penalty must therefore be accepted as the only alternative to certain deeds of violence. The fear of it teaches one to hesitate on the borderland of crime, to every one concerned it offers a vital lesson, and in the case of the evildoer himself it may encourage an otherwise unwilling penitent to secure his one only chance of redemption. Canning.

Electrolysis

HOME TREATMENT.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Everything that grows in nature depends upon a root for its growth, and until that root is destroyed the growth will continue.

When ladies realise this thoroughly, they will know how useless all liquids, pastes, &c., are for removing hair for ever.

The "Tensfeldt Apparatus" is Electrolysis simplified, and with it you can in the privacy of your own home kill the roots without leaving the slightest mark or disfigurement.

On receipt of 1d. stamp for postage, I will forward a copy of my book "The Face Perfect"—giving full particulars of this treatment—to all sufferers from this dread scourge of superfluous Hair.

When the roots are not healthy and strong, or when they are affected by germs, YOUR HAIR will not—indeed, cannot—grow. That is why

NOTHING CAN be ANY GOOD for

HAIR

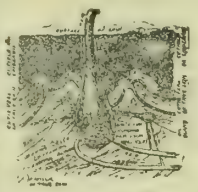
which is FALLING OUT or prematurely GREY

EXCEPT CAPSULOIDS

Magnified diseased hair as seen through the microscope, showing how all the connections at the bottom were destroyed by germs, after which it became loose, and simply fell out. This hair is now under the microscope in the Capsuloid Company's office.

Magnified, strong, healthy hair, as seen through the microscope, showing how its healthy root was so firmly fastened at the bottom that when it was pulled it tore away all the surrounding tissues from the bottom of the follicle. This hair is under the microscope in the Capsuloid Company's office.

LOOK AT THIS PICTURE OF A HAIR GREATLY MAGNIFIED, and learn how your hair grows, why it becomes prematurely grey, why it does not grow well, and why it falls out. The whole hair is produced by the multiplication of those growing cells which lie at the bottom and form its roots. They rest upon the little blood vessels which carry the blood from which the cells draw all their nourishment. You can easily see from this picture that when the harmful germs settle in those growing cells and go on multiplying they will injure the cells, which causes the hair to loosen and fall out, or become prematurely grey. If those germs are not checked they will in time quite destroy the cells, and as the roots would then be dead, it is clear no hair could ever grow from a dead root.



Those germs must, then, be killed quickly, and the only medicine ever discovered which will do it is—

No. 1585. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, May 15, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, *which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. ENTRE NOUS.

A SPECIAL Insurance Supplement, to which I desire to direct the attention of my readers, is included in the present issue of Truth. It contains, among other features, an article dealing at length with the question of insurance against the liabilities in respect of accidents to domestic servants, which are imposed upon employers by the new Workmen's Compensation Act.

Their Majesties are to give a State Ball at Buckingham Palace during the visit of the King and Queen of Denmark to London, probably on Wednesday, June 12. Invitations will be issued by the Lord Chamberlain for about 2,000 guests.

The Queen and Princess Victoria have been staying for a week at Athens on a visit to the King and Queen of the Hellenes, and the Royal yacht was anchored in the Piræus. It is now probable that her Majesty will return to England by sea, landing from the Victoria and Albert at Portsmouth in about a fortnight. In this case the Queen will halt on the homeward passage at Gibraltar and at Cadiz, where her Majesty is to stop for a day for the purpose of paying a brief visit to the Comtesse de Paris at the Château of Villamanrique, unless H.R.H. has by that time left Spain on her return to France.

The Court would have been removed to Windsor Castle for Whitsuntide if the Queen had returned to England before the holidays, but now their Majesties are not expected at Windsor until Monday, June 17, when they will reside at the Castle for a week.

The King is to pay a visit during the Whitsuntide holidays to Captain and Mrs. Ronald Greville at Reigate Priory, where his Majesty is expected to arrive on Saturday afternoon. This charming place, which belongs to Lady Henry Somerset, was let until the end of April to Lord Curzon, who has removed to Hackwood Park, Lord Bolton's picturesque old seat near Basingstoke. Captain and Mrs. Greville have taken Reigate Priory for the summer months. The Queen Anne house is very attractive, and contains a few good pictures and some fine old carvings. The grounds are extensive and well wooded, and they adjoin the beautiful heights known as Reigate Park. The house is built on the site of an ancient priory of Augustinian canons. The estate was long owned by the Howards, from whom it reverted to the Crown, and it was granted by William III. to Lord Chancellor Somers.

It was announced in Truth some time ago that the King would confer the first class of the Order of the Bath upon Prince Fushimi. The report that he would receive the Garter was ridiculous nonsense. The last Royal personage who was created G.C.B. was Prince Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, but until last week the President of Mexico was the junior Knight of this class of the Bath.

The Prince of Wales is this year the President of the Bath and West and Southern Counties Agricultural Society, and the annual show is to be held at Newport, Monmouthshire, on Wednesday, June 5, and following days. The Prince and Princess are to be the guests of Lord Tredegar at Tredegar Park from Saturday, June 8, until the afternoon of Monday, the 10th. When the Prince and Princess arrive at Newport from Paddington on the evening of Saturday, the 8th, they will be presented with an address from the Corporation at the station. On Sunday, the 9th, there is to be a special service in the show yard, with sermon by the Bishop of Llandaff, and the Prince and Princess are to attend it, with the other guests staying at Tredegar Park. The Royal visit to the show is to take place on Monday, the 10th, and it is expected that the Prince and Princess will lunch in a pavilion on the show ground before they leave Newport, late in the afternoon, on their return to London.

Princess Louise and the Duke of Argyll are to leave Kensington Palace next Tuesday on a visit to Sir George and Lady Armytage at Kirklees Park, Yorkshire, whence they will proceed on Thursday, the 23rd, to Roseneath House, their place in Dumbartonshire. On Wednesday Princess Louise will pay a public visit to Brighouse, where she is to formally open a new art gallery. On Thursday, the 30th, H.R.H. is to christen the King's new yacht Alexandra, which is to be launched on the Clyde from the yard of Messrs. Inglis at Pointhouse, where she has been built.

General Lord Grenfell, who succeeded the late Lord Chelmsford as Colonel of the 2nd Life Guards, is to replace the late Lord de Ros as Colonel of the 1st Life Guards, to which post the office of Gold Stick in Waiting on the King is annexed. Major-General the Earl of Dundonald, who is to succeed Lord Grenfell as Colonel of the 2nd Life Guards, is to be the Gold Stick in Waiting on the King during June, when there will be several Court ceremonials at which his attendance will be required.

Admiral Sir Leopold Heath, who died last week at his residence near Dorking, at the age of ninety, served in the Navy for over forty years. He was very fortunate during the early part of his professional career, as he became a commander before he was thirty. Sir Leopold's first war service was on the West Coast of Africa, when he took part in the destruction of Lagos. He greatly distinguished himself during the Crimean war, and as Captain of the Port of Balaclava he rendered most valuable public services. He was afterwards employed in the West Indies, and he did good work in connection with the Abyssinian Expedition, for which he received the thanks of Parliament and the second class (K.C.B.) of the Order of the Bath. Sir Leopold Heath retired from the Navy early in the seventies, and about ten years ago he published a very interesting volume of Crimean reminiscences.

Dr. Hamilton Ramsey, who died at Torquay last week at the age of eighty-three, was during forty years Pursebearer to ten successive Lord High Commissioners of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and during the annual session he was a prominent and picturesque figure at the Holyrood ceremonials and entertainments. He was the son of Mr. Peter Ramsey, an Edinburgh banker, and his mother was a daughter of the seventh Baron Belhaven and Stenton, and granddaughter of the chief of Clanronald who commanded the left wing of the Jacobite army at Culloden. Dr. Hamilton Ramsey worked in the Edinburgh and Glasgow Infirmaries for many years, and in 1863 he was house surgeon to Lord Lister at Glasgow. For more than forty years he had resided at Torquay, and his sub-tropical garden has long been one of the great sights of the place. He entertained the Queen (then Princess of Wales) and her daughters when they were staying at Torquay in 1886, and among his other visitors were many Royalties, including the late Queen of the Netherlands and the Grand Duchess Catherine of Russia.

Dr. John Watson, best known under his nom de plume of "Ian Maclaren," was one of the most prominent ministers of the Presbyterian Church, and distinguished as a most eloquent preacher. He was for twenty-five years the incumbent of Sefton Park Church, Liverpool, where he enjoyed great popularity, and his fine sermons drew very large congregations. He was an active figure in the social, educational, and philanthropic life of Liverpool, and worked with zeal and success on behalf of the Presbyterian College at Cambridge. Dr. Watson was as Broad a Churchman as was consistent with his position, and his well-known work, "The Mind of the Master," was regarded by many austere Presbyterians with dislike and suspicion, so that his election as Moderator of the Synod in 1900 caused some surprise, but he had well earned any honour which his Church could confer on him by his valuable and manifold services.

Dr. Watson's novels, which belonged to the so-called "Kailyard School," were uniformly successful and popular. The first of these works, "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," published in 1894, was eagerly read from one end of Scotland to the other, and by all classes of the population, and this book (and its successors) captivated the public not only at home, but also in the United States and in the Colonies. They were overdone with sentimentality, but there was also much genuine humour in them. Dr. Watson would probably have been elected President of the Cambridge Presbyterian College but for his premature and unexpected death. He literally killed himself by over-work in lecturing and writing.

Where shall one go at Whitsuntide? Somewhere, of course, far away from the rush and worry of town, but whither—to the seaside, to some pleasant rural retreat, to the Continent? The great difficulty is to make your choice from the innumerable alluring invitations that are thrust upon your attention by the various railway companies. All sorts of advantages in the way of cheap and convenient excursions are arranged to tempt you here, there, and everywhere. If you contemplate a little trip abroad, the Great Eastern offers you special facilities for visiting Brussels or The Hague, Scheveningen, and Amsterdam. The South-Eastern will take you at a ridiculously small charge to Paris or Boulogne; or, if you prefer it, the London, Brighton, and South Coast Company's programme enables you to visit Dieppe, Rouen, and Paris. For Paris, Normandy, and Brittany there are, too, the excellent services of the London and South-Western Company.

Perhaps, however, you are not inclined to go to the Continent this time. In that event the South-Eastern offers you the attractions of the watering-places on the Kentish Coast, and the South-Western tempts you to the Sunny South in Cornwall and Devon. By the new route viâ Fishguard the Great Western is running various excursions to Ireland, and for all parts of the West of England also the same line will serve you. Ireland again, and Scotland likewise, figure in the programme of the London and North-Western, in addition to North Wales, and many parts of England, not forgetting the Lake District. The Great Eastern will convey you to many bracing resorts on the East Coast. There are others, moreover, that can be reached by the Great Northern, which also makes, of course, a special feature of its fast trains to Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen. Finally, the Midland Company invites your notice to the exceptional facilities it provides for the enjoyment of "comfortable travel and picturesque scenery." It will book you at reduced fares from London to any one of upwards of 500 places in the Midlands, Yorkshire, Lancashire, Scotland, Ireland, and the Isle of Man.

BOTHA'S FAREWELL.

Farewell! Too hospitable land!
I leave thee for my native Rand,
Feeling like flour that's just been milled,
And only not by kindness killed.

Two years I bore the weary strain
Of arduous war's severe campaign
With all its hardship, all its risk,
Yet still emerged alert and brisk.

But just one month in Britain spent,
On pleasure's strenuous business bent,
Has wrought in me unmeasured fag
And left me like a wrung-out rag.

Farewell! And though I p'raps no more
Shall visit thy too generous shore,
Thy memory will, while flows life's river,
Dwell ever in thy Botha's—liver.

Lord Fitzhardinge entertained his tenants at his audit dinner the other day with a comic speech on the new Workmen's Compensation Act. The point of his joke was that on July 1 every one of them must either bet (with an insurance company), or "gamble on their own hook." His lordship drew a lively picture of a bishop opposed to betting going to an insurance office and saying, "I wish to back my cook capsizing the kettle and scalding herself; at the same time I wish to take odds on the housemaid coming a cropper over her slop-pail." Having pointed out that while a street bookmaker was liable to be run in by a "bobby" and fined by a "beak," an insurance manager was "supposed to be a public benefactor," Lord Fitzhardinge confessed that "he was so fatty-headed that he really could not see the difference between the two betting-men." Really?

Judging from the following advertisement in the Irish Times, servants must be less particular about the scope of their duties, and a good deal easier to find on the other side of St. George's Channel than on this. It is significant that the advertiser does not even think it necessary to mention what wages he is prepared to pay a "general," who is to be coachman, groom, gardener, butler, footman, and valet, and also to give satisfaction in such matters as weight, height, and religion It would really be interesting to know:—

WANTED, General Man, drive single harness, care horses, carriages, harness, work garden, cut grass, clean knives, lamps, boots, windows; if possible attend table, valet. Address, enclosing copies references, religion, age, height, weight, terms, "Z 4350, General," this office.

The following letter is an example of a curious, and apparently flourishing, industry:—

Analytical Laboratory, 11 and 12, Great Tower-street, London, April 25, 1907.

Messrs. Jas. Leslie and Co.,
Brewery Buildings, Sandy-row, Belfast.

Dear Sirs,—

Re Analytical Report on your "Sparkling Vitaqua."

I shall be glad if you will see your way to submit to me for chemical analysis a sample of this aërated water, with a view of giving you an analytical certificate as to its purity of composition, freedom from all undesirable admixture, and generally as to its merits and valuable qualities for publishing and advertising purposes.

I am convinced that you would find such a certificate as I should give that would be of considerable good in your business, and assuring you of my best services.—I am, yours faithfully, Granville H. Sharpe, F.C.S., Analyst.

With this letter Messrs. Leslie and Co. send another received from the same gentleman a few years ago, in much the same terms, but mentioning that his charge for analysis and report is two guineas, and that if samples are sent at once the report will be in time for the present season. Mr. Sharpe may say that he was quite confident when addressing this particular firm that his reports would be of a favourable character. As he is a Fellow of the Chemical Society, his reports must, of course, be above suspicion, and I presume that he does not offer to supply them for advertising purposes unless he has reason to know beforehand that they will be of a satisfactory character. There are, however, individuals calling themselves analysts who offer such reports, with full assurance that they will be found useful for trade purposes, but without having any reason to know beforehand that such a report can be truthfully made; and it seems to me that scientists who make a business of supplying such documents would do better to refrain from offering them before they are asked for, if they desire them to be considered as of any independent value.

Stephens' Blue Black Writing Fluid has been held in the highest estimation for over 70 years, and improvements have accentuated its superiority. Resolutely refuse substitutes.

Some account was given in these columns a few weeks ago of the doings of an individual calling himself the Rev. Forbes Jones. He had been connected with two ephemeral business concerns called the Church, School, and Estate Agency, Ltd., and the Illustrated Directories, Ltd., and he victimised certain poor parsons—how many he only knows—by getting from them subscriptions in advance to an illustrated clerical directory which never made its appearance. I asked if any one knew anything about him, and an answer has come from a gentleman, who, in consequence of an advertisement which appeared last November, entered into a partnership agreement with Jones for the production of a paper with the attractive title of Church and Empire. He was to put in £250, and to own one-third of the paper, and Jones was to put into the partnership certain printing machinery, type, etc., and all his rights in the proposed paper, for which he professed to have already obtained orders for advertisements. The partners were each to draw three guineas a week salary.

Under this agreement Jones's partner paid a first instalment of £50, and went to work under Jones's direction. Jones drew his full three guineas a week—the other partner smaller sums. By the time the £50 had been exhausted in this way, the other partner found that Jones had grossly deceived him. The printing plant was claimed by a creditor, and the alleged advertisements had never been promised. Accordingly, when the £50 was all gone and Jones asked for more, his partner very wisely refused to pay, and the partners separated, Jones firing off an insulting and abusive letter as a parting shot. It will be seen from this that Forbes Jones—the basis of his title "Reverend" is not evident—is a person to be regarded with considerable distrust.

The last few weeks have witnessed an almost unprecedented outburst of literary activity on the part of the Rev. George Brooks. One can only compare the spectacle to that of a great volcano in a state of eruption. Favoured individuals, mostly in the peerage, have been receiving their two or three letters in the course of a month, each one running into half-a-dozen or so of typewritten folios, and each striking out some novel line of appeal. One of the most effective begins:—

My Lord,—Those who treat me personally with discourtesy and my appeals on behalf of my work with disdain fall under the following categories:—

1. Those who think that they have done their fair share in supporting the work, and that others ought now to take it up and do their share.
2. Those who plead that other claims are so numerous and insistent that they can give no attention to this.
3. Those who think that Socialism is bound to grow to a head and do much mischief in the meantime, through which mischief people will be taught practically its dangerous nature. . . .

And so on through 4, 5, 6, 7, down to 8:—

Those who imagine that I have been guilty of some undefined enormity, that I am personally base, dishonourable, ignoble, an adventurer, a trickster, an impostor; in short, a thorough-paced hypocrite, and a scoundrel of the deepest dye.

After which the eight categories are dealt with seriatim and remorselessly.

It strikes me that there is a ninth category which Brooks has entirely overlooked, but which probably contains the bulk of the discourteous and disdainful sections of society, namely, those who regard the reverend gentleman as an egotistical wind-bag, and his "work" as indistinguishable from any other form of mendicancy. Personally, I belong to this category. After reading some of these recent appeals, it really looks to me as if Brooks' idea that he has established a claim to be clothed, boarded, and lodged by anybody in the upper classes whom he chooses to apply to has quite overmastered his reason—assisted possibly by the fact that he has had to sell his furniture again, and only got £45 11s. out of it, instead of the £80 on which he reckoned. In justification for this view, I append a passage in which he answers by anticipation those who complain that every appeal he issues is always the last:—

Note on the Finality of the Fund.

To those who object that I have before, more than once, spoke of finality, I reply:—

"True. And according to strict legality to the letter of the law, you are justified in pinning me to my words, and refusing further aid. But those who do only what they are compelled to do by law are happily few, and I don't think you are one of them. There is such a thing as going beyond law, and doing more than is required by law, as of grace, and it is when we do this that we touch the Divine. Had God dealt with us on the basis of strict hard law, where had we been? But the All-Merciful, in His Bounty and Grace, freely gave up His only Son for us all. And with Him doth He not also freely give us all other things? And should those who owe all to God's grace deny grace to all their fellow men?"

This would not appeal to any man, or every man, or to many men, but I hope it will appeal to you.

It so far appeals to me that I begin to wonder whether this singular man is quite responsible for all he says.

NURSERY RHYMES ADAPTED.

(To a Suffragette.)

Babble, babble, little Suffy,
How I wonder why you're huffy;
Shrieking on the Platform there
Like the cats that spit and swear.

Rather an interesting function took place last week at Warrington in connection with the laying of the foundation stone of the new Palace Theatre and Hippodrome, and the luncheon which followed the event was graced by the presence of the Rector of Warrington (Canon Willis) and a representative of the Roman Church, the Rev. Father Byrne. Both of their reverences made very wise and suitable speeches on the value of amusement and the power of the theatre for good; but doubtless many worthy people have been deeply shocked by their words and by their presence in such company. One such has even appealed to me to denounce the scandal. I am sorry for this, because I fear I may lose the good opinion of an admirer. But if the Hippodrome is as bad as my correspondent thinks, it seems to me that the more the clergy patronise it the better. Are the puritans going to tell us that it is un-Christian for a clergyman to lunch with publicans and sinners?

Dr. Edward Caird, who has just resigned the Mastership of Balliol in consequence of ill-health, succeeded Jowett in that office in 1893, when he went to Oxford from the Chair of Moral Philosophy in Glasgow University. Dr. Caird has thoroughly maintained the very high standard of Balliol traditions, and has well justified the great reputation which he had acquired at Glasgow. He was in some respects an improvement on his predecessor, who was afflicted with a positive mania for exalting and extolling "the nobility," both young and old. Dr. Caird has worked with tact, ability, and practical common sense, and he has been a most stimulating teacher. His deep and wide scholarship and his eminence as a philosopher are well known. His loss will be very greatly felt at Oxford, not only in the University and in his own College, but also in the social life of the place. It is expected that Mr. Strachan Davidson, Dean of Balliol, will be elected to the vacant Mastership.

Mrs. Hobhouse, who died at Wells last week at the age of eighty-eight, was a daughter of Dr. Gaisford, Dean of Christ Church, and widow of Mr. Henry Hobhouse, of Hadspen, the head of a very old Somersetshire family, many members of which have sat in Parliament. Since her husband's death in 1882 she had lived at Wells, where she was greatly esteemed and beloved for her kindness and charity. Dean Gaisford, who was singularly rough and unpolished, was one of the greatest Greek scholars of his day, and he had a European reputation. He was appointed by Lord Liverpool to the Greek Chair at Oxford, and his wife's uncle, Bishop Van Mildert, afterwards collated him to a golden stall in Durham Cathedral. In 1831 an exchange of preferment was somehow managed between Gaisford and "Presence-of-mind" Smith, Dean of Christ Church. Gaisford was delighted to return to Oxford, and he reigned at Christ Church until his death in 1855. He was indebted for his success in life to the famous Cyril Jackson, who detected his abilities soon after he went up to Oxford, and gave him a studentship of Christ Church.

There was nothing clerical about Dean Gaisford, and his periodical sermons at Christ Church were singular productions. The peroration of one Christmas Day discourse is still remembered at Oxford:—

> Nor can I do better, in conclusion, than impress upon you the value of the study of Greek literature, which not only elevates above the vulgar herd, but leads not infrequently to positions of much dignity and considerable emolument.

The Rev. L. W. Denman, who died last week at the age of eighty-six, was the thirteenth child and youngest son of the first Lord Denman, who was for about eighteen years Lord Chief Justice of England, succeeding Lord Tenterden, and being himself replaced by Lord Campbell. Mr. Denman was educated at Shrewsbury and at Magdalene College, Cambridge, and he rowed in two successive years in the University Boat Race. He wrote a pamphlet on rowing many years later, laying down principles for his University which were generally adopted, and he claimed that his suggestions had been efficacious in stopping the long run of defeats of Cambridge by Oxford. Mr. Denman was for forty-six years rector of Willian, Hertfordshire. He was an Evangelical of the old school, and was most highly esteemed by his parishioners and neighbours. In early life Mr. Denman received desirable preferment from his father's friend, Bishop Maltby, the last prelate who held the see of Durham with the old endowments and privileges.

The annual session of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland is to open at Edinburgh next Tuesday. Lord Kinnaird, who has replaced Lord Colebrooke as Lord High Commissioner, is to arrive on Saturday at Holyrood House, where he will reside with his family and suite for about twelve days. The Lord High Commissioner is to hold a Levee in the picture gallery at Holyrood on Tuesday morning before his State procession starts for St. Giles' Cathedral. There will be the usual round of big dinners and receptions during the session of the Assembly.

The Lord Chancellor has made an excellent appointment to the canonry in Rochester Cathedral which has become vacant by the preferment of Dr. Jelf to the Mastership of the Charterhouse, in the place of the late Dr. Haig Brown. Prebendary Edward Bickersteth Ottley, who belongs to a well-known clerical family, is an elder brother of Dr. Ottley, Regius Professor of Pastoral Theology at Oxford, and Canon of Christ Church. He commenced his clerical career at Hawarden, where he was curate to the Rev. Stephen Gladstone, and afterwards he was for three years Principal of the Salisbury Theological College. Since 1883 he has been incumbent of Quebec Chapel, where his predecessor was the late Canon Holland. In 1894 this chapel was converted into the Church of the Annunciation, and a district of Marylebone was assigned to it as a parish. Prebendary Ottley, who is a son-in-law of the late Bishop Hamilton, is a High Churchman, and an earnest and interesting preacher. The stalls at Rochester were formerly worth £1,000 a year, but agricultural depression has reduced the income of the Chapter, and the stipend is now about £650 a year, with house. Dr. Jelf, who was the senior member of the Chapter, was appointed in 1880 by Lord Chancellor Selborne.

The work of the London Spectacle Mission Society, which I have frequently commended to the support of readers of Truth, continues to grow and prosper, and I see from the last report that no less than 2,632 people were relieved last year. The work is done at a very trifling expense, and as those who benefit by it are all poor people, who need glasses in the course of such work as they have, the money is all usefully bestowed, especially in the numerous cases where medical advice in fitting the glasses is of importance. For the guidance of those who are ready to assist this useful little charity I may mention again that Miss C. Waring, of 197, Sutherland-avenue, W., is the hon. secretary.

At the annual meeting of the Association for Employment of Reserve and Discharged Soldiers Lord Lansdowne laid stress upon the necessity for educating soldiers in preparation for their return to civil life. This point is pretty clearly brought out in the annual report of the Association. The Association has again done an excellent year's work, and has found permanent employment for over 8,000 men, and temporary employment for 2,500 more. But in looking at the analysis of the nature of the work to which the men have been introduced in this way, one cannot help being struck by the fact that it is almost all unskilled work. Out of 8,179 men provided for during the year there are fifty-nine chauffeurs, sixteen gymnastic and drill instructors, twenty-six musicians, and 669 under the head of "various," which includes "trades, etc.," and possibly, therefore, a certain amount of skilled work. At a stretch one might possibly add to these 142 clerks and 240 grooms and coachmen, who have probably received training useful for such employment in the Army. But, all told, there can hardly be 1,000 men out of 8,179 who owe their employment to anything that they have learnt in the Army.

This, I quite admit, is not a full statement of the case. There are some hundreds of men who have found work in the Police, the Post Office, and in asylums and hospitals, and possibly in a few other positions, which is no doubt in some part attributable to the fact that Army men are specially qualified for such employment by the habits of discipline which they have formed, and the good characters that the Army is able to give them. But all these posts can equally well be filled by civilians; and it cannot therefore be said that the Army has supplied the men with any special qualification for them. It must also be remembered that the Association, with all its efforts, has only found employment for about 50 per cent. of the men on its books. The failure in the case of the other 50 per cent. gives the real measure of the extent to which the Army fails to qualify men for their return to civil life. Lord Lansdowne is therefore quite right in insisting on the necessity for further efforts to train soldiers for civil work; and the point cannot be too strongly insisted upon.

There remains the other point, which I have so frequently insisted upon myself, namely, the duty of the State and of public authorities generally to find openings for soldiers in the public service. I suppose it may be taken that the returns of the National Association cover the whole of the men who are at present provided for in this way. What does the result come to? 1,409 men employed by the Post Office, 140 in the Police service, an uncertain number—probably less than 200 at the outside—employed in public asylums or hospitals, and another uncertain number—probably about the same—employed on public tramways. The total under all these heads cannot amount to 2,000 out of 8,179 who found work through the Association and 16,343 registered during the year on its books. Apparently the number of soldiers discharged from the Army in the year, and subsequently provided for in any branch of the public service, does not much exceed 10 per cent. If it were 50 per cent., I should not think the proportion as high as it ought to be, and it is in this direction more than in any other that the solution of the problem of providing employment for soldiers on discharge is to be found.

According to a statement which reaches me from Rangoon, two men in a company of Garrison Artillery were lately found to have made free with a sergeant's signature on chits for boots obtained on credit at the shoemaker's shop, and were let off by the C.O. with a verbal reprimand. If this course had been taken on the strength of the exemplary record of the offenders, no fault might have been found with it. But, according to my information, that was not at all the state of the case. It is a fact—as this incident shows, not for the first time—that there is a public opinion among the rank and file which resents undue leniency towards men who do not deserve it, especially where they are guilty of underhand or dishonourable conduct; and it is strange that this opinion in any unit should be at variance with the opinion of the C.O. The current opinion in this instance seems to be intensified by the fact that a few days previously in the same company a gunner was sentenced to 168 hours' hard labour for a small offence, quite insignificant from the moral point of view by comparison with the one above-mentioned.

An order has recently been issued laying down that when destroyers in commission with nucleus crews are at their home ports, the commanding officer and engineer officer are each to sleep on board two nights a week, and the gunner the remaining three. Hitherto it has been the practice for a single officer to be responsible for a group of such craft lying together, and the new order is a restriction of the reasonable liberty of officers in port for which it is difficult to see a shadow of justification. Destroyers and torpedo boats are usually berthed in dockyard basins, so that there is no reason founded on danger or possible sudden emergency to require the presence of an officer on board each boat every night, and such craft in an odoriferous basin are not a sleeping place that any one will use if he can avoid it. There is a prevalent notion that the officers in this branch of the Navy are being treated just now a good deal too much like boys in training ships.

When H.M.S. Carnarvon returned to Devonport at the end of last month, and reduced to a nucleus crew, the men were invited to vote whether an English or a Maltese contractor should have the canteen. They voted unanimously for an English one. No sooner, however, was the result announced than the captain vetoed it, stating that he had arranged for a Maltese contractor. It seems a queer proceeding to take the opinion of the crew in the first instance, and then directly over-rule it, the more so as the Maltese firm to whom the contract was given was not the one which had been running the canteen while the ship was in the Mediterranean. As the ship is to be stationed at Devonport for the present, the desire of the men to be supplied by an English contractor is natural enough, and if there was to be a new contractor appointed, it would be interesting to know what reason there could be for selecting another firm at Malta. Incidents of this sort create widespread dissatisfaction, and give rise to all sorts of suspicions, probably baseless; and it is to be hoped that they will come to an end with the report of the Committee on Naval Canteens.

Some of my readers will doubtless be familiar with the name of one A. Rosenstrauch, otherwise Abraham Hornstein, a begging-letter writer, trading on his alleged character as a Christian missionary to the Jews. He was included with others of his class in the last Truth Cautionary List, and to this fact I presume I am indebted for the following communication, and the legal proceedings referred to in it. It reached me some three weeks ago, in an envelope playfully addressed to "Labby's Editor, 10, Carteret-street, Westminster." In view of the concluding paragraph I have kept it by me, in expectation of the further proceedings threatened, but having heard nothing further from Rosenstrauch, I conclude that this threat was merely one element in the series of practical jokes which he is perpetrating:—

AN UNJUST AND PARTIAL DECISION.

Herr A. Rosenstrauch
v. Plaintiff.
Labby and Editor
Defendants.

On March 14 and 18, 1907, respectively, I filed two affidavits in the High Court of Justice (Crown Office) (refuting completely Labby's fables and deliberate lies) in support of an application to commence criminal proceedings against the above Defendants for publishing libellous and defamatory matter on February 6, 1907, for objects of notoriety and money-making.

The Crown Office issued the Summons (Judge's Summons) on the strength of my affidavits and by leave of the Judge in Chambers.

The case was heard and my affidavits read before Mr. Justice Sutton in Chambers on March 18, 1907.

"Why don't you take proceedings for libel in the Civil Court?" questioned the Judge. "Criminal proceedings only will deter these two self-righteous individuals from indulging in extravagant defamation of others," I replied.

Defendants have not filed any affidavit to substantiate a single item of their libel or refuted a single line of my affidavit, giving them the lie direct in the open Court, but took refuge in a trick, to which I called the Judge's attention in a subsequent letter.

Counsel for the Defendants produced a letter which they allege I am the author of, and begged the Judge to suppress its contents, as they have suppressed the entire proceedings. He also produced some typewritten letter (both withheld from Plaintiff in the above action) referring to a similar application I made against Morgan and Scott, a few years ago. Mr. Justice Darling then held that it was a libel for the Civil Court only, and on that ground only Defendants escaped from taking their seats in the Police Court Dock.

It is rather cowardly on the part of these professional libellers to shelter themselves by such a mean trick, it would have been more manly, had they filed an affidavit to substantiate their libels or refuted my affidavits, but that was impossible, I admit, and involved perjury, either way.

Being unable by Legal rules of the Court to appeal against the decision of the Judge in Chambers (however unjust and partial) in criminal matters, I have but one alternative to take action for libel in the Civil Court only, as suggested by the Judge.

It is the fact, as stated in this curious document, that Rosenstrauch did, in March last, apply to Mr. Justice Sutton, in Chambers, for leave to commence criminal proceedings against "Labby and Editor." It is also a fact that his application was refused, and, as I believe, that counsel on my behalf did, among other things, exhibit to the learned Judge an unsigned letter from Rosenstrauch received at this office before he took his proceedings. Proceedings before a Judge in Chambers are absolutely private, and Rosenstrauch's present suggestion that counsel on my side "begged the judge to suppress" the contents of this letter is therefore a self-evident absurdity, as is also the observation that I have "suppressed the entire proceedings." The letter in question was undoubtedly written by Rosenstrauch, and was of a grossly obscene nature. He has been in the habit of writing abusive letters to this Office ever since he first came under notice in Truth. Under legal advice I have hitherto refrained from mentioning the proceedings in Chambers, but as Rosenstrauch himself now complains that the facts have been suppressed, he can have no objection to my giving full publicity to what has passed, and his own version of it in the above document. I presume that the explanation of his proceedings is that he desires to persuade people from whom he begs that he has taken vigorous notice of the warnings that have been given in Truth against him. My own view is that they only help to make clear what sort of person he is.

I was very glad to see the reports of a meeting held the other day at the Mansion House for the formation of a genuine Legal Aid Society for the benefit of poor people. A great deal has been said in Truth lately about the mischief done by bogus workmen's legal aid societies, which are mere touting agencies for a shady class of solicitors. Poor people easily fall victims to manœuvres of this kind, and every Act passed by Parliament conferring new rights or immunities upon working-men and their families increases their need of protection against the harpies who are ready to use such legislation for the purpose of plundering poor and ignorant people. The Central Legal Aid Society which has now been started will find incidentally a great opportunity for usefulness in suppressing a few of the touting agencies already in the field. The fact that the council formed at the Mansion House includes eminent lawyers like Sir Charles Mathews, Sir John Macdonell, Mr. Stanger, K.C., and others, should insure its making itself really useful both in this and other directions.

The Lord Advocate, I am pleased to note, is putting an end to the mischievous and illegal practice which has arisen in Scotland of suspending the operation of the Lottery Acts in the case of lotteries promoted, or purporting to be promoted, for religious or charitable purposes. Answering a question in the House of Commons last week, he pointed out that the only authority which could properly sanction these exceptions to the general law was the authority of an Act of Parliament, and he had no such authority, but was bound to administer the law irrespective of whether the delinquents were or were not actuated by philanthropic motives. Appeals to permit violations of the law have reached the Lord Advocate from churches and clubs, and in at least one instance from a local trades council, but he has refused all of them, and intimated that in future offenders will be prosecuted without further warning. This is as it should be. There is no reason whatever why breaches of this law any more than any other should be tolerated simply because the law-breaking is professedly done with a good object.

The Lord Advocate's remarks with reference to the impartial enforcement of the law against all offenders, regardless of their motives, may be specially commended to the consideration of his colleague, the Postmaster-General. A few weeks ago, when a correspondent protested against the delivery through the post in open covers of packets of circulars and tickets relating to a Roman Catholic lottery at Dublin, the Secretary to the Post Office replied:—

> I am directed by the Postmaster-General to inform you that it is not the practice of this office to interfere with the transmission of such packets when the circulars relate to drawings for religious or charitable objects.

In other words, the Post Office connives at the infringement of the law if the lottery is supposed to have a religious or charitable object—I say "supposed," because the postal officials can only judge from the statements of the promoters, which are not necessarily true. The practice of the Post Office in this matter is wrong in principle, and contrary to the law, and ought to be at once discontinued.

By the way, scores of circulars from various Continental lottery touts have been sent on to me in the past week or two with suggestions that the Post Office ought to prevent their delivery. One batch emanating from H. Langenhahn and Co., Bremen, was posted in bulk in London, the envelopes bearing the "paid" endorsement instead of postage stamps. In this case, at least, an ordinary degree of alertness on the part of the Post Office officials must have resulted in the arrest of the person or persons who by despatching these advertisements of a lottery rendered themselves amenable to the criminal law. Paul Goldenberg, of Hamburg, another of the touts, has also had a large quantity of circulars brought over here to be posted. For the purpose, however, of evading inquiries at the Post Office he has used ordinary penny postage stamps on the envelopes and had them posted in batches at different offices in Manchester, Liverpool, and possibly other towns.

R. H. Schroder, of Copenhagen, has adopted another dodge. His circulars relating to a Danish lottery are posted in Germany, and the envelopes in which they are enclosed are adorned with a small picture of a young woman with a luxuriant crop of hair. Around this work of art is the legend, "Mr. J. ——'s Haar-Farbemittel," Schroder's object evidently being to delude the postal authorities into supposing that the envelope contained an advertisement of a hair dye. Besides the above-mentioned firms, Korda and Co., of Budapest, are also among the most active of the lottery circularisers just now. It is, I hope, almost superfluous to add that I strongly advise my readers to have nothing to do with any of these touts, whose statements regarding the conditions of the gambles in which they offer tickets are grossly misleading.

The extraordinary difficulties that beset all legislation on the subject of trade-marks are shown by the question which Mr. Justice Kekewich had to decide last week as to whether the word "Apollinaris" is one that can be registered as a distinctive trade-mark in connection with the well-known mineral water bearing that name. To the ordinary man it would seem that there ought not to be much doubt on the point, especially under an Act passed within the last two years. But the Board of Trade had objected to register the word, and a bewildering amount of legal ingenuity was spent in arguing the pros and cons of the case in reference to the exact words of the Act, when the matter came before the learned Judge. However, the end of it was that the proprietors of the spring were held to be entitled to register the word as their trade-mark, subject to an undertaking given by them that if they should ever sell any other water they would not apply this trade-mark to it. The decision seems to be in accordance not only with the interests of the company, but that of the public, whose principal concern is that when they ask for Apollinaris they should be sure of getting it.

A choice exhibition of Justices' justice was given at the County Petty Sessions at Carlisle the other day when two youths named Hudson and Skinner were charged with maliciously doing damage to the amount of one shilling to growing grass belonging to Mr. W. B. Maxwell. It was alleged that both of them were among a party of about fifty youths who were playing football in a field. Hudson pleaded guilty and was fined half-a-crown and costs. Two policemen deposed that they saw the other defendant in the field, but Skinner swore that on the Sunday afternoon in question, at the time of the offence, he was at a "P.S.A." meeting, of which he was a member. Two witnesses who were at the meeting corroborated this, and Skinner's solicitor was prepared to call two more, but the Clerk to the Justices said they had heard sufficient. The Bench then retired and on their return the chairman announced that there was "an element of doubt" as to the guilt of Skinner, and he would be given the benefit of the doubt by the dismissal of the summons but without costs.

To talk about an element of doubt in the case was nonsense. There was no shadow of doubt whatever. Skinner had an absolutely perfect and conclusive alibi, and it was obviously a case of mistaken identity on the part of the constables. Before the hearing it was intimated that the complainant, Mr. Maxwell, wished to withdraw the summons against Skinner, but he would not pay the latter's costs, and so the case proceeded. Mr. Maxwell is a magistrate and was present on the Bench, though he did not adjudicate. Can it be that this fact had anything to do with his fellow magistrates' grudging dismissal of the charge and refusal to award costs to the wrongly-accused defendant? It is, at any rate, difficult to discover any other explanation of this palpable injustice.

As may naturally be expected at this season of the year, the influence of the game preserver on the county benches of magistrates is made strikingly manifest. A couple of instances out of a large number which have been brought under my notice appear in my Legal Pillory below. Shallow may have a tender heart for the ruffian who beats his wife, his fount of sympathy towards the brute who delights in torturing dumb animals may not be dry, but let the scoundrel who dares glance upon a game-egg be brought before him, and he may be assured that the justice accorded him will be untempered with mercy. I should like to impress upon the minds of the worthy magistrates who deal severely with these offences that it is persons of their own class who are mainly responsible for their multiplication. The labourer who takes the eggs, and even the dealer who buys them from him, is, after all, only the tool of the game-preserver who is anxious to stock his own coverts.

The Kent Education Committee cut a very discreditable figure in a case in the Westminster County Court last week, in which Miss Pooles, the late headmistress of the infants' school at Halling, sued the Committee for £39 10s. salary in lieu of notice. The Committee summarily dismissed the plaintiff because in their opinion she "had been guilty of conduct incompatible with her position as head teacher of a school, by incurring debts which she was unable to meet, by having committal orders against her in the county court, and by having furniture seized by the sheriff in her house." It appeared that the plaintiff had got into debt owing to the fact that she had been supporting her aged parents and an invalid brother, and that last year she had a long and expensive illness, during which part of her salary was stopped. Unfortunately, she was driven into the clutches of moneylenders, and judgments were obtained against her, but she made a full and frank disclosure of her position to her employers, and suggested that a portion of her salary should be allocated to the liquidation of her debts. Instead of showing her the sympathy which her difficulties might have been expected to excite, the Committee summarily dismissed her, though it was admitted that she bore an excellent character, and was an efficient teacher. Judge Woodfall gave Miss Poole judgment for the amount claimed, and it is a pity that the Committee could not be mulcted in a further substantial sum for damages for their harsh and unjust treatment of this poor schoolmistress.

Judge Taylor, of the Liverpool Court of Passage, is apparently one of those judges who take the narrowest possible view of their powers with regard to the revision of moneylending transactions. A borrower applied to his Honour for relief under the Moneylenders Act from a bargain with a usurer named Cameron who had charged him interest at the rate of 125 per cent. per annum on a loan for which he had the security of the title-deeds of some freehold property. The Judge refused to interfere on the ground that the borrower must show something more than excessive interest—something in the nature of fraud—to make the transaction harsh and unconscionable. This is a mis-interpretation of the first section of the Act which has been repeatedly corrected, and in the present instance, on the borrower's appeal, the Court of Appeal ordered a new trial of the case.

A grasping usurer named Wm. Griffin, of the Minories, Birmingham, found a Daniel come to judgment in the Shrewsbury County Court last week. Griffin lent a local miller and his wife £40 on their joint promissory note, which had been renewed several times. Altogether they had paid back £73 10s. Griffin sued them for a further sum of £14 10s., but the defendants' solicitor asked that the terms of the transaction should be revised on the ground that it was harsh and unconscionable, and Judge Harris Lea thereupon directed that an account should be taken on the basis of allowing the plaintiff interest at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum. The effect of this was that, instead of being permitted to squeeze more money out of the defendants, Griffin was compelled to disgorge some of the plunder he had already obtained.

In connection with the "gold brick" swindle it has once or twice been mentioned that mysterious letters are sometimes written from America warning possible victims in this country of the impending operations of the swindlers. Here is a curious example of one of these letters, addressed, like the "gold brick" letters themselves, to a lady deceased in this country. Although dated from Denver, it bears the New York postmark:—

To the Heirs of the Deceased:

You are liable to receive a letter addressed to her telling of the discovery of a fabulously rich gold mine, and for her to come or send a representative to look after her interests, and take charge of the gold mine now on hand. The party who I think will write to you has some knowledge of your connection with us and our mines. If receiving a letter it will be from an impostor and swindler. Have nothing to do with him, or answer any correspondence by cable or otherwise. As soon as I can arrange our business, and make everything secure here, I will come to England and see the heirs personally.—I remain, yours sincerely,

William.

It is pretty evident here that "William" is himself an operator in the "gold brick" line, who desires to "queer the pitch" for his rivals generally, with a view to commencing operations on his own account at a later date by means of a personal interview on the subject of "our mines." Instances have already been mentioned in Truth where the swindle has been attempted by means of a personal call from a representative in this country of one of the numerous firms in the American trade.

Apparently our old friend Tanquerey, of Paris, has exhausted his lists of people in the United Kingdom who can be successfully caught by postal circulars, for he is distributing a fine illustrated advertisement to the press. The advertisements are being offered by an agent in Holborn, and my information on the subject comes from Ireland. It seems rather surprising that at this time of day a London agency should be found willing to do work in furtherance of the "free portrait" swindle, and one can only hope that newspaper proprietors will have a sufficient sense of their duty to their readers to refuse Tanquerey's seductive offers.

Further evidence of the swindling business carried on in the name of the Croydon Local Time Table Company, Ltd., has just reached me. The witness gives a list of ten or a dozen tradesmen in his neighbourhood who have been taken in by tricks of one kind or another on the part of the canvassers for advertisements in these time tables. He himself, after refusing an order more than once, was eventually caught by consenting to write down his address for the canvasser in case he should subsequently think better of it and forward an order. The signature thus obtained was subsequently used in the Croydon County Court as evidence that the order had been given. In the vast majority of cases, of course, the company rely on the smallness of the amount and the distance which has to be travelled in order to defend a county-court action, to prevent tradesmen resisting the demands made upon them. But the whole of this business, which has now been conducted for years on the same lines, depends upon the readiness of the Registrar or the Judge of the Croydon County Court to accept the evidence of the company or its canvassers, and in view of all that is known about these people, it seems to me that the County Court authorities are more to blame than anybody else for the success and permanence of the swindle.

It is rather disappointing to find an employment agent, who is duly registered by the London County Council, pursuing the old game of advertising an attractive berth, and demanding fees from those who respond as the price of being put into communication with the advertiser. This discovery arises in connection with an advertisement issued only a fortnight ago by Miss Nina Braithwaite's Ladies' Employment Bureau, 23, Margaret-street, W. The post offered was that of "lady-companion secretary to an elderly gentleman, at a salary of £50 a year," with the prospect of "wintering on the Riviera, and all travelling and entertaining expenses paid," the only qualifications being "sound education and ability to write a good letter." This is the sort of advertisement to which dozens, and possibly hundreds, of girls are pretty certain to reply; yet on a girl answering this advertisement she receives a prospectus of the terms of the Bureau, with an intimation that the elderly gentleman's name will only be imparted on payment of a booking fee of 5s.

Assuming the bona fides of such an advertisement as the above, the course adopted is nevertheless as unjustifiable from the point of view of the employer who commissions the agency as of the employees who are thus forced to pay fees, with the certainty that all but one will pay for nothing. But what has also to be remembered is that this style of advertisement can always be "faked up" by an unscrupulous agent, and that wholesale frauds have been perpetrated in time past by such means. It was to check all such business that the Bill providing for the registration of employment agencies by the County Council was passed. I do not know whether the Council has made any rules for regulating the business of registered agents, or under what circumstances the registration may be revoked. But nothing can be more undesirable than that practices like that described above should be carried on by parties who are able to announce their business as having a sort of sanction and approval from public authority.

But would they? That's the point. And I,
From what I've oft observed, reply
With an emphatic "No!"

In reply to the letter signed "Gamma" in last week's TRUTH, Lieut.-Colonel Dunscomb writes to dispute the proposition that the last General Election was fought on the issue of Free Trade. He says:—

> It was fought in the main on three issues—(i.) the clinging to office of a Government that had exhausted its energy and outlived its popularity; (ii.) the Taff Vale decision; (iii.) Chinese slavery. (i.) was settled by the result; (ii.) has been dealt with; (iii.) has been proved a deliberate terminological inexactitude.

Granting all this—though it is all arbitrary assumption which no one but a keen partisan will either put forward or believe—what answer is it to my previous correspondent? He imagined the case of a movement originating in England for uniting the Mother Country and the Colonies by means of an Imperial Established Church, and a motion being made by the Home Government in an Imperial conference recommending that each of the Colonies should establish the English Church as a State Church as a matter of Imperial policy. What he asked was how this would differ from the Colonies moving in the Conference that we should establish a protective system of tariffs for their benefit.

The question really is whether it is useful or conducive to Imperial harmony that questions of domestic policy, which each constituent State of the Empire claims to decide for itself, should be raised at these conferences, and made the subject of recommendations addressed by one State to another, whether by a Colony to the Mother Country, or vice versâ. What a pretty outcry there would have been in certain quarters if the Home Government had brought forward a resolution at the Conference recommending the Colonies to promote Imperial unity by admitting British goods to Colonial markets on the same terms as those on which Colonial goods are admitted to our own, that is to say, free of duty!

I thought the speech of Mr. Lloyd George the most practical of those delivered at the Colonial Conference. He did not discuss the rival merits of Free Trade and preferential tariffs, but spoke as the exponent of the views of the United Kingdom, as expressed at the last General Election. They were in favour of Free Trade, and specially against any tax on imported foodstuffs or raw material. This being so, the British Government could give but one reply to a proposal of the Colonies that these articles should be subjected to an import tax in order that Colonial produce might be protected in our market against competing produce from other countries; nor could the Colonies complain that we act upon what we believe to be essential to our interests, any more than we could complain that the Colonies did not act upon our Free Trade views, and let in our products duty free.

I confess, however, that I did not quite understand Mr. George's utterances in regard to our readiness to cheapen the price of colonial produce in the home market by an improvement in transport facilities. This he seemed to consider not beyond the resources of British statesmanship, though, at the same time, he pronounced against subsidising merchant shipping. But how else can over-sea transport be improved by the State except by such subsidies? It passes the art of man to reduce the distance between us and the Antipodes. The freight to Australia and to New Zealand would be less were it not for the Suez Canal dues. But we could not differentiate in these dues between foreign ships and ours, and if the dues disappeared to-morrow, Canada, which is the most important of our Colonies and the greatest producer of corn, would not benefit. Mr. Lloyd George appeared to have some hazy notion that all countries, wherever situated, could be—so far as freights are concerned—placed in an equal position when sending their produce to us. This, however, is as difficult as it is to square the circle, unless some one is prepared to do so by paying any excess above the cost of transport from our nearest Colony.

Only forty-eight peers were found to vote against Lord Cawdor's proposal for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider all suggestions that have from time to time been made for increasing the efficiency of the House of Lords as a legislative machine, and in the debate that took place on this proposal their lordships made many protests against any reduction of the legislative powers of their House, although they let it be understood that they might be inclined to consider some plan to alter its composition, provided that they themselves were allowed to decide what peers are to sit in it. On such terms they even went so far as to hint that they might be inclined to admit a few nominated members. Lord Rosebery, who on this occasion masqueraded as a Conservative, declared that a reduction of the legislative powers of the House could only be effected by a revolution.

The Government very rightly declared that it would have no part in such a Committee. It could hardly have done otherwise if it is in earnest in its assurances that it intends to limit the power of the Upper House. It is obvious that it is desirable first to agree as to what the powers of an Upper House are to be before deciding how it is to be composed. I only hope that there will be no compromise of principle. Provided that the veto of the Upper House be limited to one Session, it is a matter of comparatively small importance how the House is to be composed.

But will these noble legislators listen to a word of well-meant advice from a Liberal? There is no doubt that there is a large majority in the country in favour of a limitation of the veto. To effect this a revolution is not necessary, although possibly it may involve a dissolution ad hoc. Knowing as they must know this, is it wise for them to create trouble by a refusal to assist the inevitable? Most Liberals would have no objection to an Upper House composed of men of light and leading, outside all party politics, who would have an opportunity to pronounce an opinion upon any measure before it has passed the Commons, with the knowledge that the country would have the time to consider this pronouncement before the measure becomes law. Were I, therefore, a noble lord, I should not run my head against a stone wall, but I should concentrate all my efforts to bring into existence an Upper House, so composed that its solemn protest against a Bill, emphasised by compelling the House of Commons to go over it again, would cause many supporters of the measure to reconsider their views about it. I believe that this would act as a strong barrier against hasty, impulsive legislation, and against any majority in the House of Commons legislating in defiance of electoral pledges, or in defiance of a change in public opinion that might have occurred after the General Election. But hereditary legislators are utterly at variance with the spirit of the age, and any legislative chamber, composed even in part of such survivals of the past, would always be without influence on public opinion.

Presumably the Irish Council Bill gives us the principal features of the scheme which was all but hatched out two years ago under the joint care of Lord Dudley, Mr. Wyndham, and Sir Antony MacDonnell, with the friendly supervision of Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour. Every one remembers how the birds were suddenly scared off the nest, and endeavoured to pretend that there was never an egg in it. On no account would I question Mr. Birrell's parental rights in the fledgling which he is now mothering so affectionately. Of course, he has not hatched out Mr. Wyndham's egg, though he has been sitting on the same nest. But every fowl that escapes from the shell has a father as well as a mother, and grandparents as well; and in this case it is useful to bear in mind the pedigree of the little stranger.

If Mr. Wyndham had been permitted to complete the process of incubation, no doubt there would have been a few different markings on the wings and tail, and perhaps a little more orange tint in the plumage generally; but the general structure and habits would have been identical, and if the two could be placed side by side the expert, especially if he were an Ulsterman, would unhesitatingly have pronounced them to be of the same breed. It is necessary to remember this, because it is by no means impossible that Mr. Wyndham, Mr. Balfour, and Lord Lansdowne will at once set upon Mr. Birrell's chicken and endeavour to peck it to death. This will not only be an exhibition of pitiful jealousy towards a more successful mother, but an unnatural outrage upon the claims of natural affection.

Mr. Birrell has not expressly apologised for his progeny, or protégé, on the ground that it is "a very little one," but he might have done so truthfully; and, listening to his speech, the thought seemed to be in his mind. The only people who have a right to object to the Bill on that ground are Mr. Redmond and his party, but it was left to Mr. Balfour, of all people, to put the objection forward on their behalf. The Nationalist view seems to be that a little one is better than none, and that the bantling may grow in time, of which Mr. Birrell also held out hopes. This is a reasonable view for a Home Ruler, Irish or English, to take—especially while the House of Lords has still to be reckoned with. But it is a view unfortunately incompatible with any enthusiasm for the measure.

The aim of the Government has obviously been to devise a mere scheme of administrative reform, so modest that no serious agitation can be got up against it in England, and that the House of Lords will have no excuse for rejecting it. But they thus run into the opposite danger that the Bill will have no driving force behind it, and that the Lords may thereby be emboldened to massacre the innocent without fear of the consequences. This is the danger of all half-measures for a Liberal Government under present conditions, and to a majority like that which now dominates the House of Commons half-measures are peculiarly dispiriting and distasteful. The present Ministry seems to need a little of the l'audace et toujours l'audace spirit. The Party will probably thrive better with less food and more seasoning.

That Lord Cromer was a great and able pro-consul, no one can dispute. To him it is largely due that Egypt is prosperous and well-governed. His mistake —as it seems to me—has been to consider that provided a country be well governed it is not desirable that its people should have any voice in its government. We obtained the assent of Europe to our exercising sway in Egypt on the distinct pledge that this sway was to be temporary, and that we would endeavour to teach the Egyptians to manage their own affairs. The latter part of the undertaking we have not attempted to carry out, and Lord Cromer has not only admitted this, but urged his successor to continue his system. Thus, whilst Egypt has benefited materially by our rule, the population does not love us, and the number of fairly educated Egyptians who claim the same rights which we ourselves boast of possessing is annually on the increase.

This creates for us an unsafe position, and is at variance with all our doctrines in regard to the government of the people by the people. Lord Cromer seems to be of opinion that any Egyptian who claims a voice in the government of his country is a graceless and thankless rascal. But should we be prepared to allow ourselves to be ruled even by angels from Paradise, if they were not British citizens? Should we deem those who rebelled against this angelic rule noisy, blatant demagogues who did not understand what was best for them? I do not say that we should at once establish in Egypt the degree of self-government that we have at home. But we ought to make some endeavour to train the Egyptians in the principles and habits of self-government, and this can only be done by giving them some sort of a representative Assembly, with some sort of rights. I trust that Sir Eldon Gorst will adopt this course.

There is really no room for any serious difference of opinion as to the necessity of "resolute Government" in India, whether at the present juncture or any other. We hold India by the power of the sword; we shall never hold it by any other power; and we mean to hold it. Granted so much, it follows that nothing in the shape of a seditious movement or tendency can be tolerated, and if it arises it must be suppressed by main force. To deal with the present situation on any other principle would be not only a blunder, but a crime of appalling magnitude, involving consequences compared with which a few summary repressive measures, even if they inflict hardship or injustice on a few individuals, are insignificant. When you discover a fire smouldering in a powder magazine you do not, if you are of sound mind, stop to inquire into its origin, or to reflect upon the value of fire as a servant of man. You do not even regard the damage that will be done by turning on the hose.

It is an example of life's little ironies that Mr. John Morley should be the Minister who has to direct the hose in this instance, and suppress meetings, hurry off agitators to gaol, and warn journalists. He will be able to "Remember Mitchelstown" without the assistance of Mr. William Redmond. It is another irony of the same order that India, the biggest unit in the Empire, should have obtruded itself on public notice in this uncongenial way in the midst of the Imperial junketings in London. If the intention had been to remind us that there is a British Empire outside the parishes of Mr. Deakin and Sir Wilfred Laurier, the moment could not have been better chosen. There is, however, an advantage to be hoped for from having Mr. Morley at the India Office at present, provided he recognises the necessity of preserving order at all costs, as he seems to do most thoroughly. The policy he has now to execute will be thoroughly distasteful to him, as everybody must recognise. His record is a security that the policy will not be overdone, and should, therefore, disarm the opposition of those who dislike it as much as he does. It is also a security that the causes of the present movement will in due course be carefully investigated, and that so far as they arise from administrative errors or genuine grievances they will be honestly dealt with.

THE LOGICAL BELINDA.

Belinda was a pretty Maid
In Wealth of bounteous Charms arrayed,
Who plighted had her Troth to marry
A nice young Artisan named Harry.
But Jack—a gay Lothario he—
Chanced one fine Day the Girl to see,
And, smitten with her pretty Face,
Pursued her hard in amorous Chase.
  Long Time the Fellow's bold Insistence
She met with obstinate Resistance,
Declaring that her Maiden's Heart
No more was hers wherewith to part,
Nor would she falsify the Vows
She'd pledged to Hal, her promised Spouse.

"A Kiss? The Right's to you denied.
My Lips are Hal's alone," she cried,
"Who'd hold, and hold me well, untrue
If I should yield their Sweets to you."
"Ah, but," persists the ardent Beau,
"Your Hal, you see need never know."
"Avaunt! I neither ought nor shall.
I'd scorn to thus deceive my Hal."
But still his Suit Lothario pressed,
Still with fond Pleas the Maid addressed,
Until, at length, she acquiesced,
Gave to his Lips her blushing Face,
And yielded to his warm Embrace.
Nor ends the Matter, well I wis,
Between them with one stolen Kiss;
But Jack and she, Belinda fair,
Ere long devoted Lovers were;
And he grew most amazing jealous
Did she but speak to other Fellows.
Nor without Cause, as it appears,
He entertained such jealous Fears,
For one Day, as I've been advised,
The faithless Damsel he surprised
Lending her Waist's symmetric Charm,
Submissive, to another's Arm.
Down on his Sweetheart fierce he pounced,
And thus her Perfidy denounced:
"You vowed that you were all mine own,
And henceforth pledged to me alone.
Yet now you let another Man
Your willing Waist unlawful span.
How dare you, Jade, deceive me so,
And faithless cheat your faithful Beau?"
To whom, with bold, unflinching Eyes,
And mocking Mien, the Girl replies:
"You taught me to deceive my Harry,
The Man whom I was vowed to marry,
And proved I might sans Wrong or Harm
Submit to your encircling Arm.
And if I might, Sir, for your Sake,
Harmless my Troth to Harry break,
No Harm can be ('tis plain inferred)

WANTED—ELEVEN THOUSAND SIXPENCES!

As many of my readers will remember, it has been suggested that an effort should be made to continue the annual gift of new sixpences to all the children in the London Poor-law institutions, which has been made for so many years by the late Sir Francis Tress Barry in connection with the Truth Christmas Toy Show. Before coming to any decision in this matter, I have endeavoured to ascertain what support the idea is likely to receive. The only reason why I have hesitated is that the Truth Toy Fund has necessarily the first claim on my regard, and I do not wish to commit myself to the collection of a considerable sum for a collateral purpose without seeing some prospect that this money can be obtained independently of the Toy Fund, and without drawing off subscriptions from it. The promises of support that I have received since the suggestion was first made justify me in hoping that the sixpences may be provided without hurting the Toy Fund. I have therefore inquired of Sir Edward Barry whether an attempt to perpetuate his father's donation would be agreeable to him and to his family generally, and whether they would approve of the late Sir F. Tress Barry's name being associated with a fund for that purpose. I have had a cordial reply in the affirmative, and, under these circumstances, I have decided to do my best.

I am therefore in the position of wanting eleven thousand sixpences. It may be that I shall want more, but certainly not less, for unhappily the number of children in the London workhouses is ever growing, and Sir F. Tress Barry increased his donation several times before it reached the final figure of eleven thousand sixpences. I hope it is not necessary to expend many words in commending my appeal to the public. The condition of a child brought up, perhaps even born, within the walls of a workhouse speaks for itself eloquently enough to any one endowed with an average store of the milk of human kindness. We have done something to improve the condition of such children since the days of Oliver Twist, and Mr. Bumble survives to-day, it may be hoped, only in name. But at the best, the children of the Poor Law know nothing of the associations of home, even in its humblest shape, and are cut off by an impassable gulf from all that offers most joy to childhood—all this through no fault of their own. To bring pleasure into these forlorn little lives is at once as useful and as kindly an act as charity can perform. That, I take it, was the feeling that the late Sir F. Tress Barry had in his heart, when he first asked the Editor of Truth to assist him in presenting a new sixpence at Christmas to every child in a London workhouse. Whatever may be done by those in charge of them to brighten the existence of these little ones, there is one pleasure that they can scarcely ever know, and that is the satisfaction of possessing money of their own, even but a few pence, and spending it according to their own fancy. Thanks to Sir F. Tress Barry, all the child-paupers of London have known this pleasure at Christmas-time for many years past. I ask all whom my words can reach to unite in securing to them the same pleasure in the Christmases to come.

The money that is required for this purpose is, from the point of view of a public subscription list, quite insignificant. Three hundred pounds will more than suffice. Not a few people who will read these words could give the whole amount and scarcely miss it. If every one who reads them would send a single sixpence, just the price of one copy of Truth, the amount would be raised over and over again. I hope it is not necessary to say more. For the reason mentioned above, the "Tress Barry Fund," as I propose to call it, will remain open until the end of July. After that date it will soon be necessary for me to appeal for subscriptions to the Truth Toy Fund, which, of course, covers a much larger field, being designed for the benefit of children in the hospitals as well as those in the workhouses, and the two funds must not clash. The only reason why I propose to keep the new fund open to subscribers even as long as that is that readers of Truth in India and other distant parts of the Empire may have an opportunity to contribute. I hope that those nearer at hand will subscribe promptly, and that the whole of the money required may be raised in the course of the next few weeks. I shall be glad to receive the subscriptions at once, but if it is more convenient to any subscribers to defer payment, I shall be equally pleased to receive their promises now and their payments any time before December. It is my hope to distribute the sixpences, as heretofore, with the toys and dolls provided by the TRUTH Toy Fund, and in accordance with Sir Edward Barry's suggestion, I shall endeavour to obtain new sixpences from the Mint for the purpose, in order that Sir Tress Barry's idea may be carried out in its integrity. Will every reader of TRUTH now kindly put his or her hand into his or her pocket?

THE PARISH AND THE TITHE-OWNER.

The following is the letter from the Rev. J. W. Rhodes, Vicar of Whaplode, which I was compelled to hold over last week:—

DEAR SIR,—I am most grateful for your article in this week's TRUTH on the Uppingham scandal.

Your informant, a trustee of Uppingham School, says that the Whaplode matter has not been before the Uppingham Trustees for fifteen years. As a matter of fact it has been before them continuously ever since I have been Vicar of Whaplode, nine years ago; and I believe I am right in saying it has never once been before the Johnson Foundation. If ever it has been before the Johnson Foundation it is since my formal printed statement complaining of this very grave irregularity.

In proof of this, I enclose one of the letters of the clerk to the Board, saying that my letter was placed before "the Uppingham and Oakham Governors," and I would gladly forward the whole of Mr. Finch's letters, if you care to see them, all of which say that my letters have been placed before the Uppingham Governors.

Now as to the amount of money taken from Whaplode. Your correspondent has not noticed the words of my printed statement, namely, that "the Great School (and its sister institution) has sucked something like £1,600 per annum for nearly 300 years," of which the great part goes in equal shares to Uppingham and Oakham Schools, and a fragment goes to the hospital. But does the amount affect the question of the honesty of the transaction? I have been strictly accurate in my statement as to the amount and as to its destination and use. Whatever the Trustees take for Uppingham and Oakham schools, do they use it as the trust directs? That the income from other sources is so large, and the Whaplode contribution only as a drop in the bucket to them, is surely a reason why they should find it easy to fulfil their trust, and do that which to us is of such vital consequence.

You, Sir, will find on examining your informant's explanation, that my statement that "the great and affluent have given their sons an expensive education under cost price. . . . and poor Whaplode Church has to pay some of the difference," is strictly accurate, referring as it does to both Uppingham and Oakham schools.

I think you will find it difficult to name a parish treated as Whaplode is treated by a board of trustees representing a great foundation, be it school, college, or hospital, and composed largely, as this board is, of great Church dignitaries. Guy's Hospital has built a large church, and endowed it, not ten miles from here; and the funds of Guy's Hospital minister to the very poor in the greatest distress, not to the well-to-do. We only ask for the same treatment as is meted out by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to the hundreds of parishes of which they hold the great tithes.

That trustees have to act "as a machine without reason and without conscience" is one of our strongest contentions. It is exactly the treatment we ask for, and it is in this particular that these gentlemen have erred. They have observed one part of their trust, and neglected two parts. They hold our tithe and chancel in trust, and your informant has fixed your attention on the Uppingham responsibility to the exclusion of the other. . . .

My contention is:—(1.) The terms of the trust under which this foundation appropriated our tithe distinctly specify that the ancient obligations to the chancel are first to be discharged, and then they may take the balance to Uppingham. This they reverse. They spend practically all on their foundation in Rutland, and utterly neglect Whaplode Church. (2.) But even so, the discharge of their duties in Rutland is singularly unfortunate, for the money ought to be used in educating "poor scholars." It is notorious that they do not fulfil that obligation, and in order that they may carry on their disregard of obligations both to Whaplode and to poor scholars, they dismiss from their foundation the very members of it who were put on ex officio, in order to see that the terms of the trust were impartially fulfilled. . . .—I am, Sir, yours obediently, JOHN W. RHODES, Vicar of Whaplode.

Mr. Rhodes is a trifle hard on my previous correspondent, and I have taken the liberty of eliminating one or two passages of his letter for that reason. My first correspondent only knew of Mr. Rhodes's pamphlet from what he had seen in TRUTH, and the passage which I quoted did not contain the reference to "the sister foundation." He cannot be blamed, therefore, for having understood that the Vicar's observations referred to Uppingham School exclusively. Nor can there be any justification for doubting his assurance that during the fifteen years that he has been a trustee of Uppingham School he has never heard anything of Whaplode parish and its grievances. At the same time, it is pretty clear that he must be rather an exception among the Uppingham Trustees, and it is certain that all of them cannot plead that they know nothing of the responsibilities of the several foundations in regard to Whaplode parish. The truth seems to be that there are three boards dealing with these charities, and that they are all closely mixed up together. In addition to the two bodies mentioned in TRUTH of May 1 (the Governors of Archdeacon Johnson's Hospitals and the Trustees of Uppingham School), there is also a board of Trustees of Oakham School; and though I have not a list of the last-mentioned, I gather that just as a number of Archdeacon Johnson's Governors are on the Uppingham board, so a corresponding number are on the Oakham board. The Uppingham trust is constituted under an order of the Charity Commissioners, dated, I think, in 1872, and I suppose the Oakham trust was regulated in the same way about the same time. In a further communication, Mr. Rhodes mentions that the Johnson, Uppingham, and Oakham Trustees are accustomed to meet at the same place and on the same date, and that it is the common practice to allude to them collectively as the "Uppingham Governors." There cannot be much doubt about this, in view of the letter enclosed by Mr. Rhodes, in which the clerk to the Trustees, in reply to an official communication from the Vicar, distinctly states that the matter has been "considered by the Governors of the Oakham and Uppingham Foundation at their meeting yesterday." Under these circumstances, it does not look quite fair either for the Uppingham or Oakham Trustees to disclaim all knowledge of Whaplode and its grievances, whatever may be the fact in regard to certain individual members of these boards.

The real point of this business seems to me to be contained in Mr. Rhodes's concluding observations, from which it appears that £1,600 per annum in the shape of tithe is taken from his parish under a trust, which expressly vests the chancel of the church in the tithe-owners, and lays upon them the duty of maintaining the chancel, making it a first charge upon the trust fund. This is the first time that I have heard of the existence of an express trust to such an effect; but that such a duty exists, and has been recognised by the Board of Rectors up to a point, is clearly proved by the fact that they did, many years ago, rebuild the chancel of the church. They seem to have done the work in such a shabby style that it has really been a disfigurement to the church, and that it now requires doing again. The condition of the chancel to-day is at the bottom of the Vicar's agitation. On this statement of the case it would seem that there must be some legal remedy for the purpose of compelling the Rectors to discharge their duty. In the addresses that he has recently delivered Mr. Rhodes has discussed this question, but I see that in the last of them, which is reported in the Spalding Guardian of May 4, he says that in 1900 a petition to the Bishop of Lincoln was prepared, that the Bishop wrote to him requesting that it might not be presented, and that his hands are consequently tied by respect for the Bishop. This seems rather to shift a shade of responsibility for the present state of affairs on to the Bishop of Lincoln.

Mr. Rhodes thinks it will be difficult to find a parallel for the situation in his parish. That may be true, having regard to the fact that the trustees of whose conduct he complains include several bishops, deans, and other dignitaries of the Church. But there would be no difficulty in finding other instances in which tithes have been assigned to lay or other rectors, subject to the performance of duties to the parish which have been in a greater or less degree neglected. Owing to the recent references in Truth to Lord Portsmouth's relations with one of his tenants, my attention has been called to a state of things in a Devonshire parish of which Lord Portsmouth holds the rectorial tithe, and where there is a state of things closely parallel to, and from the point of view of the Church actually worse than, that prevailing at Whaplode. The parish in question is that of Coleridge, North Devon, and a statement of the facts was given in a leading article in the Devon and Exeter Gazette, of April 26. The article states that the Earl of Portsmouth, as Lord of the Manor, "is responsible for the maintenance and repair of the chancel [of the parish church], in return for an income of about £150 per annum, which he derives as lay impropriator of the rectorial tithe of the parish." The chancel has fallen into a dilapidated condition through sheer neglect, and for some years past its state has been considered dangerous. Two years ago one of the diocesan architects reported that it required to be practically rebuilt. Shortly before last Christmas the choir and organist declined to continue their services, owing to the personal danger which they were incurring; and in consequence of this the church has been entirely closed during the winter months, though since the weather improved arrangements have been made for conducting services in the nave. I learn from the Rev. H. G. Lowe, who is Vicar of Coleridge and Rector of the neighbouring parish of Nymet-Rowland, that for ten years past appeals have been made to Lord Portsmouth to repair the chancel, and the report of the diocesan architect referred to above was communicated to his Lordship two years ago, but all without result. "I have appealed," says Mr. Lowe, "to the Bishop of Exeter, and my Archdeacon; but it appears that a lay rector can do 'little or nothing' in the way of repairs, as he thinks fit." Lord Portsmouth evidently thinks fit to do nothing, although the chancel has been repaired by his predecessors from time immemorial, and although he draws rents from this district in addition to the rectorial tithe.

Presumably the obligation on the lay rector in the last-mentioned case rests upon custom or common law, not on the express terms of a trust, such as Mr. Rhodes alleges exists in the Whaplode case. But however the duty may arise, it is obvious that there ought to be definite and accessible means of enforcing its performance, which apparently do not exist at present. To say, however, in relation to any ecclesiastical scandal, that this thing or that "ought to be done" is of little assistance towards getting it done; and while I am glad to do anything in my power to let daylight in upon grievances like the above, and wish that good results may follow from that process, I confess that I regard all such cases with something like despair. Abuses unknown in any other religious community flourish unchecked in the Church of England, because they are rooted deep down in the legal constitution of the Church and its relations with the State, and because the spiritual heads of the Church dread the disturbance of the soil, without which such weeds cannot be eradicated. The attitude of the majority of Churchmen, including practically all the higher clergy, towards scandals in connection with ecclesiastical property is that of timid persons towards sleeping dogs, and from their own narrow point of view it may be that the timid policy is the wise one. In this state of things the only sort of remedial measures which will do any good are outside the sphere of practical politics. The best that can be hoped, therefore, for the present, is that the influence of public opinion upon individuals when the facts are made known beyond the limits of the small local community affected, may do something to check the grosser abuses of the rights of property at the expense of the parochial clergy and their congregations.

A DANGEROUS DEBT-COLLECTOR.

For several years past warnings have appeared in Truth against a firm styled I. A. Hardy and Co., otherwise the United Kingdom Colonial and Foreign General Accountancy Offices, of Chancery-lane. Hardy and Co. advertise themselves as debt-collectors, and the warnings that have been given in Truth have been founded partly on the difficulty which clients have experienced in collecting the debts from Hardy and Co. after Hardy and Co. have collected them from the debtors, and partly on the outrageous charges which have been made by Hardy and Co. for such services as they perform. The firm professes to collect debts for a small poundage, but when matters come to be settled up, the poundage is generally swollen by preposterous charges under the head of "postage." Two cases were recently mentioned in Truth, in one of which, after charging 2s. for collecting a debt of 10s., Hardy and Co. added another charge of 3s. 9d. for "postages," while in another they charged 5s. under this head, in addition to a commission of 3s. 6d. Another trick is to charge 2s. in the £ when a debt is withdrawn from their hands, although their prospectus of terms states that no commission is chargeable on unrecovered amounts. I have made numerous attempts to interview the firm personally with a view of ascertaining what they had to say for themselves in cases to which my attention had been called, but whenever a representative of Truth has visited the alleged United Kingdom Colonial and Foreign General Accountancy Offices in Chancery-lane he has found the place shut up. Some weeks back I mentioned that a firm of solicitors who had been in communication with Hardy and Co. found that all the letters they received from them bore the postmark "Finsbury Park," which bore out the suspicion I had long entertained that the address in Chancery-lane is merely an "accommodation" one for the receipt of letters.

I have lately received from an accountant in the North of England particulars of lengthy negotiations which he has had with this firm on behalf of the executors of a client who had entrusted Hardy and Co. with a debt to collect. The first thing which this correspondence shows is that the inference which I had already drawn as to the character of the alleged offices in Chancery-lane is perfectly correct. In 1905 my informant, Mr. Wall, of Oldham, issued a County Court summons against Hardy and Co., failing to obtain a settlement from them by other means. The High Bailiff of Westminster County Court reported that he could not serve the defendant, that the office was always closed, and that nothing could be found out about Hardy and Co. Mr. Wall also ascertained from the High Bailiff that there had been a similar difficulty about the service of process in a great many other cases. Having found that Hardy had never been seen at the block of offices which he uses as his address, that he paid his rent by post, and that he also had a private letter-box at the West Central District Office, Mr. Wall wrote a statement of the facts to the General Post Office, and asked to be informed to what address Hardy and Co.'s letters were forwarded. The Postmaster-General replied that the letters were forwarded to Mr. I. A. Hardy, at 113, Mount View-road, Stroud Green. Further inquiries elicited that no one named I. A. Hardy was known at that address, but that the house had been occupied for about four years by a Mr. Frederick William Hardie.

While these inquiries were in progress, Mr. Wall had been corresponding with Hardy and Co. viâ the address in Chancery-lane. The following are specimens of letters written by Hardy during that period:—

Sir,—We have received your ridiculous, impudent, libellous postcard.

You are absolutely wrong in supposing (if you now really do suppose) that there exists any reason why we should not meet you or any one else. On the contrary, we will be very glad to do so, by appointment, at our office as above. It is, however, not convenient to wait all day long on the chance of meeting you or others, and we have not hitherto found any necessity for it.

If you are the authorised person to receive the amount due to the alleged Exors. of the late ———, we must have their authority to pay you, as it is not at all clear how the matter came into your hands. You have not inspired us with any confidence in you, your methods being grossly illegal, and will get you into trouble ere long.—Yours obediently, I. A. Hardy and Co.

N.B.—This correspondence must now cease. Let the necessary authority be submitted, and the amount due and proportionate costs will be sent.

After receipt of this Mr. Wall called at Chancery-lane without seeing Hardy, and wrote to him to that effect, adding that in consequence of inquiries that he had made, he should take some more serious steps unless he received the sum of £3 8s. and costs due to his client by a specified date. The following is Hardy's reply:—

Sir,—Your letter of yesterday's date to hand. Very sorry we did not see you on Tuesday when you say you called, as it would have saved trouble and waste of time.

You appear to have been making yourself remarkably busy with our affairs of late, with your inquiries, your grossly libellous letter to the Post Office, your groundless accusations, and your further insult by this morning's post.

We do not owe Mrs. ———'s Exors. £3 8s., as you must know quite well. What we do owe we are quite wiling to pay to you on receipt of the Exor.'. authority to do so, but their legal right to give you such authority will first have to be inquired into.

As to the summons you refer to, we have not received it, and were quite unaware that such had been issued until we heard from the Post Office. Until yesterday (Friday) we were quite unaware that the late Mrs. ———'s name appeared on our books, and it was only after most dilligent [sic] search that it was at length discovered, the matter being over five years old, during which time no application had been made until March 18 last. This was replied to, asking for our reference number, or the date when the case was submitted to us, as we could not find the case on our books. There was no reply to this, and we heard no more of it. The office at Chancery Lane not being open perhaps so much as is customary is not due to fraudulent purposes as you have stated, but to the fact that about 12 years ago it was found not to be large enough for requirements, and for that reason the bulk of the business was transferred to a suburban office, and there is no ground or justification for your charges or accusations.

We suppose that the reason the summons was not served was because personal service was required.

The balance of the late Mrs. ———'s account will be sent on the receipt of the necessary authority, as aforesaid.—Yours obediently, I. A. Hardy and Co.

Mr. Wall replied to this that on receipt of the address of the alleged "suburban office" he would communicate with Hardy and Co. again, and he suggested that in the meantime they should call at the Westminster County Court and receive the summons there awaiting them. Needless to say, this was not done, and after a further delay of some months an order was obtained for service of the summons by post. Ten days later Hardy paid into court the full amount of the debt and costs.

The final result sufficiently shows the emptiness of the pretences for refusing payment set up in the letters given above. By his own showing, Hardy had collected this money and stuck to it for five years. At the time when he wrote the second, if not the first, of the above letters, he knew that a County Court summons had been issued, and that the bailiffs had been unable to serve it. He was invited after the second letter to call at the County Court and receive the summons, or to furnish his true address. He did not do so, but lay low and allowed several months more to elapse, until he was hunted down and served with the writ by post, when he finally gave up the game and paid the money. I have gone into these transactions fully, first, because they show clearly the character of the business which is carried on from the address at Chancery-lane, and secondly, because they will show other persons who have difficulty in getting money out of Hardy how to corner this individual. From what has been stated by the authorities at Westminster County Court, it is evident that many creditors have been defeated by the ingenious system which the man has devised for carrying on his business, and at the same time concealing his whereabouts. But with knowledge of the above facts, anybody can now find him, or trace him, if he removes from his address, 113, Mount View-road, Stroud Green. I hope that others will now succeed in making him disgorge, and also that nobody for whom he may collect debts will in future submit to his impudent methods of levying toll on such money as he accounts for.

MR. TAVERNER AGAIN.

Mr. William Taverner has favoured me with a letter in his usual style, in response to the observations in last week's Truth on his latest doings in connection with the Old Age Pension Trust. It begins:—

We have a clear indication of the careless manner in which you make your statements in your issue of this week, printing anything that a correspondent pleases to send you without the slightest regard to authenticity. You have never yet published a truthful article about the Pension Trust, and so long as you will not take the trouble to investigate, I fail to see how it is possible for you to put the "truth" before your readers. . . . .

The reader may take the measure of this individual's impertinences by referring to last week's Truth, where it will be seen that the whole of my observations were founded upon a letter of his own in the Congleton

Chronicle. He seems to have represented the state of the case pretty accurately in suggesting that I ought to have investigated further if I wanted to put the truth before my readers, instead of accepting his own statements about his own doings.

He goes on to say that the passage which I quoted from his own letter beginning, "Sir, there goes out from West House several million pounds annually in the form of pensions," was misprinted, and that he wrote "if," not "sir," and holds a letter from the editor of the Congleton Chronicle expressing "his deep regret" for the printer's error. I have no objection to give him the benefit of the correction, but on the principle that he has himself laid down for my guidance, it would seem that I ought to make independent investigations before taking his word for this statement. He says that it is "not his intention to provide lodgings for women on a charitable basis, as the sum we charge yields a 5 per cent. interest on the investment." He is going according to his own statement, to provide women with "rooms" at 1s. a week rent, and as I do not believe that he can get 5 per cent. interest on any investment on that basis, I can only explain his calculation by the same arithmetical hocus-pocus which he has used to demonstrate the soundness of his pension scheme.

I am reluctant to trouble my readers at any length by bandying words in public with this man, but as he is still busily pushing his schemes, and his dupes are innumerable, I hope I may be excused for giving a further example of the shuffling and prevarication to which he resorts when making a show of answering criticism. I referred last week to the observations of Mr. Justice Kekewich in dismissing his last appeal in the litigation with the Spurgeon Memorial Sermon Society. The words of the learned Judge were quoted in Truth when the case was reported. Taverner now says:—

> As I have never had an appeal in connection with any litigation with the Spurgeon Memorial Sermon Society, neither Mr. Justice Kekewich nor any other Judge has ever yet dismissed an appeal on any subject with which I have been associated or the Sermon Society either. . . . [I omit a passage in which a gross libel is made upon somebody else in relation to circumstances of which I know nothing.—Ed.] As the Daily News was the only paper which so misled its readers as to make them believe that there was a trial before Mr. Justice Kekewich, much less an appeal, it is obvious that the above is the source of your misleading observations, unless you are in league with my late fraudulent. . . . [More libels.—Ed.]. If you, too, are bent on protecting the guilty, then further expostulation is useless.

I do not see what it matters whether I took Mr. Justice Kekewich's observations from the Daily News or any other paper, so long as the Judge made them, which, it will be noted, Taverner carefully avoids denying. But, as a matter of fact, I have never seen any reference to the case in the Daily News, my knowledge of it was derived wholly from the long report which appeared in the Times of January 30 last. I have referred again to this report in the vain attempt to make out what Taverner means by denying that he was engaged in litigation with the Spurgeon Memorial Sermon Society. The Times report shows that an action was brought by Taverner against the Rev. W. Cuff and others, whom I understand to be the trustees of the Society; that the dispute was referred to arbitration; that the arbitrator found against Taverner on all points; that Taverner thereupon moved the Judge to set aside the award, and that the motion was refused. The only basis there can be, therefore, for Taverner's denials in the above passage of ever having had any litigation with the Society, or any appeal dismissed by Mr. Justice Kekewich, is that he is distinguishing between an action against the trustees of the Society and an action against the Society, or else that he means that a motion in Court to set aside an arbitrator's award is not an appeal. It is quite immaterial what he does mean. But it is decidedly material to see that the suggestion he now puts forward that Mr. Justice Kekewich never had an opportunity of censuring him, rests entirely on empty prevarication.

The words of Mr. Justice Kekewich, as reported in the Times, repeated in Truth of February 6, and again referred to last week, were as follows:—

> The arbitration was heard at great length, and his Lordship could well understand, after seeing Mr. Taverner in the box, that the arbitrator had a very troublesome duty to perform. When the plaintiff was asked a question he responded by making a long speech. His evidence was full of inaccuracies and hopelessly untrustworthy.

The reader, who has now had an opportunity, not of seeing Mr. Taverner in the box, but of seeing how he seeks to throw doubt on the fact that Mr. Justice Kekewich made these observations, can judge for himself how far his Lordship was justified in making them, and to what extent Mr. Taverner's inaccuracy and untrustworthiness when giving evidence in the witness-box are a sample of his general habits. I hope that the evidence he has now himself furnished may serve to enlighten some of the thousands of people whom he is fooling, in Congleton and elsewhere, as to the character of the person they are dealing with.

THE THEATRES.

"Strongheart," at the Aldwych.

I thought at first that I was in for an evening of emphasis and football leather, naught beside. Strenuous indeed was the talk, and wan my mood as I listened to the swagger of these youths at Columbia University, noting for future reference the slips of paper substituted one for the other. Both contained identical lists of signals to be used during the football match, impending like a thunderstorm. The question obviously is, who shall traitorously give them to the rival captain? We are, of course, misled for a time, as is the nature of this kind of rebus. With the advent of Act II. we are witnesses of what can be done by our cousins in lung power and asseveration. It was tremendous. A hullabuloo outside the dressing-room of this football team; a tornado within. For they have been worsted by their adversaries at half-time, and it is necessary to win at any cost in the next tussle. Manslaughter as justifiable homicide was the cheerful theme of the Columbia captain, and I was more interested in the ethics of Transatlantic football than in the ousting of the Red Indian Strongheart from the team. For he it is who is suspected of treachery. The close of this act represents an orgy of mudstained youths triumphant over their adversaries. The two following acts were more interesting, showing the development of the difficulties connected with the suspected traitor, "Strongheart." For he can, if he please, save his own character by incriminating another, and we are even given to understand that the lady of his strong heart will be his, if he stoop to betrayal. Of course, he comes forth victorious from the ordeal. But the question of race is the pivot of the plot, and although he wins the love of Molly, and she is ready to follow him even to the ends of the earth, the call of his native tribe triumphs over his love. Duty's victory. In the last act, indeed, a Red Indian appears to summon his chief back to government of the tribe, his father being dead. Goaded to fury by the behaviour of his white fellow-collegians, this Red Skin shows his teeth at the end of the third act, yet resigns the lady at the end of the fourth and last. I believe his triumph would have been more convincing if the long scene between him and his Red Indian tribesmen could have been replaced by a letter or some brief communication, and the Red Indian been allowed the great moral victories over his love and over the race prejudice and suspicion of his rectitude which damn the doings of the latter acts. Mr. Robert Edeson gave a colourable rendering of this noble creature's soul. Nobility superior to the conquerors of his race spoke in every word and gesture. He did not stoop to some of the tricks used by the white men for attracting sympathy or a laugh. Melodrama was at the back of much of their doing, and facile appeals to sentiment. Those who do not object to the din of the first two acts, and are not displeased with the facile appeals above referred to, may be interested to watch the breaking of a strong heart on the wheel of circumstance.

The Empire.

"Sir Roger de Coverley," the new ballet at the Empire, deals in eighteenth century wares. Picturesque enough are the costumes of Miss Craske as that gay cavalier Fancourt, of the ethereal Adeline Genée as Lady Dolly, of Sir Roger himself, and of the numerous company that weaves its paces round the displeasure of that unhistorical personage. Mr. Adrian Ross has invented a story which does not tally with what is known of Sir Roger; he has, indeed, cut his coat according to the skirts of his ballet, rather than trouble about the homespun of historical accuracy. Yet I should have liked to see more than I did of Lady Dolly the unhistorical, of Lady Dolly the light of toe, the true of heart. There were two reasons for this, the first being that on this occasion Miss Adeline Genée does not fill so large a space of the entertainment as usual; the second and more conclusive, a cluster of ostrich plumes. Many such plumes waved upon the stage, but those I refer to operated in my immediate neighbourhood. They waved in the crowded rows of the stalls. If the matinée hat be an abomination, what shall be said of the evening ostrich plume? That vespertinal adornment concealed from me much of the happenings in the ballet of Sir Roger de Coverley, and convinced me that the only coign of vantage is the front row of the stalls, or of the dress circle, or a box. All else is perilous. Nothing amuses me more than the acidulated sweetness of voice with which one woman says to another seated in front of her at a matinée, "Would you please remove your hat?" I have never had the audacity to invade this feminine privilege, this triumph of the modest over the monstrous in matinée hats. "By how much the more, then," as Euclid would say, should I fail of the audacity required for the utterance: "Madam, kindly remove your head-dress and some of your stray curls"—for, as I understand, these do not nowadays always exist apart.

It was a beautiful arrangement of curls and feathers that luxuriated between me and the stage, occasionally allowing a glimpse of Miss Ada Reeve between the feathery curves; certainly I did not fail to catch every syllable sung by Miss Ruby Helder, the girl baritone, that eccentricity of nature; I seemed to detect the Perezoffs depending from the topmost plume, adroit jugglers as they are; while the great Le Pages turned themselves over a great many times between the blue plume and the white. I hope soon to see "Sir Roger de Coverley" again under circumstances less ornithological.

The children's performance of "Miss Hook of Holland" was an amusing afternoon's interlude of last week. The humours of Mr. Hook, as played by a young lady of sixteen, were set off by the luxuriance of Miss Gracie Leigh's understudy, of about the same age, who really triumphed as out-caricaturing the caricature of the market girl as given by Miss Gracie Leigh. The permanently unemployed were also well represented by a young gentleman hitherto unknown to fame, and the other amusers in Mr. Rubens' amusing musical play were mimicked most amusingly to their faces; for several of the principal performers dotted stalls and boxes, and seemed even more tickled than we with the humours of their juvenile diminutives.

The childish performance of "Peter Pan," given some months ago, can alone be placed in the same category with this, and that, it must be admitted, was even more guilelessly amusing than Miss Hook of Holland in very short skirts.

To another performance, also youthful, but of a serious and deeply interesting character, was I also invited last week. I refer to the mixed performance at the St. James's Theatre by the members of the Academy of Dramatic Art. The act from "The Merchant of Venice" was illumined with the talent and comeliness of the performers and the beauty of their costumes, excelling that from "As You Like It," which went before. Miss Beatrice Smith, however, was the triumph of the afternoon. Her rendering of the sleep-walking scene from "Macbeth" electrified the audience, both by reason of diction and grasp of the character. This young lady is likely to be heard of again ere long. The entertainment closed with an act from "The Ambassador," which was well rendered by Miss Smith and others.

At the Playhouse on Thursday afternoon, the 16th, a number of theatrical personalities are combining to give an entertainment under Royal patronage. Its object is to provide funds for the Girls' Realm Cot at the Great Ormond-street Hospital for Children. Mr. Cyril Maude himself will appear, with Miss Winifred Emery, and I see that Miss Camille Clifford, Miss Phyllis Dare, Miss Zena Dare, and Miss Billie Burke are among those who have promised to assist. Tickets may be taken at the Playhouse or at the Social Bureau, New Bond-street.

Mr. George Alexander has lent the St. James's Theatre for a matinée to be given on May 30, for the benefit of Miss Fanny Coleman, who has just completed her fiftieth year on the stage.

At the Alhambra, during the current week, one may hear Senorita Maria Vincent, who comes to us with her Continental laurels fresh.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

"MONSIEUR ALPHONSE."

WHAT memories of the past are awakened by "Monsieur Alphonse"! I do not mean the Spanish heir, but the famous play which has just been revived at the Théâtre Français.

Thirty odd years ago, Alexandre Dumas the younger wrote "Monsieur Alphonse," a play which stirred the conscience of France to its depths, which helped the country, indeed, to shape itself a new conscience. The author handled in it the subject of conjugal infidelity and the rights of illegitimate children, and he did so with a boldness to which the public were unaccustomed. Zola had not yet made his mark, and the literary models of the time had formed their ideals among the snobs and upstarts of the Tuileries and of Compiègne. Alexandre Dumas' sincerity came at a moment when the country, just recovering from the shock of the war, thirsted for something different from the frivolity of the Second Empire. He was himself an illegitimate child in the eyes of the law, and yet privileged because, however born, Dumas the younger could feel proud in being the child of Dumas the elder. The attachment between father and son was tender and lifelong.

Yet Alexandre Dumas fils felt that he was by reason of his birth the champion of children unfortunate enough not to know their parents. His views on a wife's infidelity he set forth in a pamphlet which appeared about the same time as the play, and was soon out of print. His advice to the husband, "Kill her!" must be taken as a paradox. It meant simply that as long as French law refused to recognise divorce there must be hopeless situations in French families. His logic was pitiless in its form only. His real feeling he shows in "Monsieur Alphonse."

This play, which enriched the French language by a new word—an "Alphonse" is the lowest state of infamy to which a man may sink—and which, indirectly, enriched the French Statute-book by a new law, the Naquet Divorce Act, came out originally at the Porte Saint Martin Theatre in 1873, with Mlle. Blanche Pierson in the leading feminine rôle of Raymonde de Montaiglin. She was then in the early bloom of her creole—creole of Bourbon Island—loveliness, which was, above all things, remarkable for harmoniousness. Alphonsine, the comic actress of the Palais Royal, in the part of "Madame Guichard," relieved the long-winded dialogues of the leading personages with her side-splitting drollery and fun, which closely approached low comedy. Her humour was rather masculine than feminine, and full of good humour with no nervous effect.

She it was who suggested the title of the play. Alexandre Dumas was perplexed about the name he should give his hero, a very low sort of Don Juan—not even a Don Juan. He was afraid of actions at law from namesakes in real life. Alphonsine came to his help. "Since the hero is my lover," she argued, "you may call him Alphonse. As long as I do not object, I do not see who has a right to." And thus it came to be that the pale-faced, professionless individuals who prowl about the night haunts of Paris qui s'amuse are to this day called "Alphonses." "Monsieur Alphonse" was more than a play: it was a political pamphlet, a plea for divorce—a thing prohibited by the Catholic Church, and consequently forbidden in all Catholic countries—and also a vindication of the rights of illegitimate children.

This pamphlet has wrought its purpose: divorce now exists in France, children born outside the pale of marriage are no longer—or much less than formerly—social outcasts. Legislation is now quite different, public taste has altered. Yet I found "Monsieur Alphonse" not only as fresh as when I saw it thirty years ago, but actually improved by age. It was not so outré, startling, sensational. Alexandre Dumas, like Wagner, like Whistler, and like many others, was ahead of his times. His point of view was peculiar in 1873; it is now that of the man in the street.

You know the story of the play. Octave, a young ruined bourgeois, is a sort of Don Juan. He is what one would call nowadays a degenerate—a word that was not used thirty years ago. He is about to marry a former housemaid, the widow of a wealthy hotel-keeper who went through the form of marriage with her during his last illness, and left her his fortune. Mme. Guichard's ambition, with a fortune of several thousand a year, has been to marry a "gentleman," and in Octave, who is five or six years her junior, she has found her life's dream. The scene opens at the house of Captain de Montaiglin, of the French Navy. The Captain is getting on in years. He is leaving on the next day for a long cruise, which will be his last one, and then he will retire. He says to Mme. de Montaiglin, a former village schoolmistress, who is his junior by fifteen years: "Do not thank me for having raised you out of poverty. You have made my life worth living. For five years you have been my companion, and now, in my old age, you will be my friend."

In the first scene the author brings us into the heart of his subject. Mme. de Montaiglin is talking with Octave. Her swollen eyes show that she has been crying. Octave is shrugging his shoulders. They are talking about a terrible secret. It was a long, long time ago. Octave was not twenty years of age. He met the young lady who was to become Mme. de Montaiglin and fate took its course. There was a daughter, whose birth was kept a profound secret. She was sent to the country to be brought up by peasants. Mme. de Montaiglin sees the child as often as she can. Octave goes down to see her, too, from time to time, but under an assumed name as "Monsieur Alphonse." Now Alphonse has just become engaged to the wealthy Mme. Guichard. But she has no idea of the existence of this daughter. Octave is bent on getting the fortune as well as the hand of Mme. Guichard, and he now feels that his daughter, a girl of thirteen, is indeed an encumbrance. So he asks Mme. de Montaiglin to take his daughter off his hands. Octave tells the Captain a plausible story. The daughter's mother, he says, is dead. The Captain agrees to receive the girl as if she were his own child.

This arrangement is upset by the arrival of Mme. Guichard, whose part in the play is that of the "comic Irishwoman." This excellent lady was struck by certain mysterious absences of her fiancé. With the help of a private detective she traced him down to a country farm, whence he was seen to return to Paris with a little girl, and the pair were followed to the house of Captain and Mme. de Montaiglin.

The incidents of the plot now follow upon one another with a rapidity that leaves you no time to breathe. The Captain discovers that the little girl is his wife's daughter, and that Octave is the father. Mme. de Montaiglin drops on her knees awaiting her husband's sentence. He generously forgives her; as he says: "You have sinned, you have suffered, you have atoned, you have repented; what right have I to punish you?" Every sentence in this scene shows the hand of a master. The good Mme. Guichard now discovers the existence of the little girl. "I will adopt your child," she tells her fiancé; "I make this a sine quâ non condition of our marriage." Octave, or "Monsieur Alphonse," who was so anxious to get rid of his daughter, is now equally anxious to get her back. Too late, however. The Captain has adopted her, and "Monsieur Alphonse" loses, not only his daughter, but the large fortune he was to have secured by his marriage, because Mme. Guichard, dazzled at first by his fine manners, now sees the sort of scamp he really is and sends him about his business.

The part of Mme. de Montaiglin is not exactly one in which I would have expected to see Mme. Cécile Sorel, who is accustomed to lighter rôles. She was beautifully repentant and mother-like. The dress she wore in the three acts consisted of a white satin sheath laid over with a lilac kimono of very transparent silk muslin. Mme. Thérèse Kolb's rendering of Mme. Guichard reminded me very much of Mme. Alphonsine thirty-five years ago.

The Joan of Arc Eighth of May has been kept according to the new fashion, and has drawn more sightseers than ever to Orleans. But the châteaux—that is to say the châtelains along the Loire—who had engaged rooms for the fêtes, cancelled their contracts, proposing, however, to hold them good for the next Sunday—the date fixed for the religious celebration in the cathedral.

As a stage manager the Church is preferable to the Mayoralty, and more especially the Mayoralty of a stagnant and Bœotian place like Orleans, where the people are said to have neither blood nor wine, but plum juice in their veins. The serene and noble gravity of a religious procession takes hold of me like "God Save the King" or certain passages of the Anglican liturgy, when I hear them in England after a long absence abroad. The civilian French fête is now more in tune with "La Marseillaise," or even with "L'Internationale," and the general state of mind and nerves that brought them forth. The one drawback to the religious procession, from the stage-management standpoint, is the stultified faces—stultified to disfigurement—of those tonsured waiters on the altar who intone the psalmody of litany.

The story of Joan's life ought to impress on young minds the incalculable power of personal initiative and pluck when exerted at the right time. A youngish vicar-general or a village damsel would have been a fitter person to bear her banner than a police sergeant in his regulation clothes and heavy shoes. The flic who served as ensign in the procession would certainly, if he had lived in Joan's time, have run her in as though she had been a Suffragette, and, considering the laws and ideas then ruling, with perhaps greater reason.

The brains of the Orléanais rarely sparkle with original thought, and are too lazy to innovate. His wits are in the nape of his neck, when they ought to be in the forehead ready to run into apposite speech. Perhaps when Orleans has had time to think out the details of a fête on the new, secular model she will seek out in the Orléanais a rosy-cheeked, well-built country girl to serve as banner-bearer.

The French common people like marching troops, military music with military movement, or any kind of action that goes pat to it. They had both at the festal Eighth of May. The sullen mood of the rich people, as shown in closed venetian blinds, escaped the notice of the multitude, embracing, perhaps, 30,000 strangers. Most of these were country folks, who, without being a bit religious, would have dropped down on their knees at the sight of a bishop scattering benedictions with two up-raised fingers. There being no bishop present, they applauded the Freemasons and "Monsieur Fernand," the name by which Deputy Rabier is known in the Loiret. Their ears did not in the least suffer from occasional discords of the many bands and fanfares, the ringing out of the cathedral chimes, and of sundry cracked bells in other belfrys. The lively, rattling, screaming, trumpet-blaring noise delighted, after the dull silence of homesteads and hamlets. If the sightseers regretted the absence of red cardinals, mauve bishops, ermined canons, the jewelled splendour of reliquaries, episcopal crooks, croziers, and mitres, they had the school children, fresh as May flowers and in their best bibs and tuckers. The old banner alone reminded them of the close of the Gothic time, with its fierce combativeness, romance, bright day-dreams, noontide nightmares, spirituality, and knavish canaillerie. Philippe de Comines, I recollect, belonged in youth to the Joan of Arc period, and in his later years to that of Louis XI. He was the father of Macchiavelli and a precursor of Richard Crookback.

Joan's banner is a copy made more than fifty years ago of a copy executed in the reign of Francis I. under the supervision of Queen Claude, Duchess of Orleans in her own right. Bishop Dupanloup supervised day by day, and under a magnifying glass, the progress of the second copy, counting the threads in the figures and other objects represented. They are God the Father seated on clouds, with two kneeling angels as "supporters." Fleurs de lys serve as sprigs on the "field." Each angel holds a larger lily in its right hand. The words "Jesus Maria" serve as a motto. The silk, once a pure white, is now time-stained and the colour of old ivory with sepia blotches. The mayor had had this relic of the Dupanloup episcopate fetched from the Cathedral on the eve of the fête. He wanted General Millet, the commander of the troops at Orleans, to take it in charge and transport it in military state next day to the Town Hall, to present it to the Town Council there. Leave had been asked of the War Minister, who gave it, but at the same time authorised the General to act as he might think fit. He declined the honour, because a Protestant. It would ill become him to do anything which might wound the feelings of his Catholic brethren-in-arms. Gentlemanly, this!

In birth, breeding, speech, appearance, Joan remained to the end a peasant girl, free spoken, saucy, and ever ready with a prompt and not always a courteous retort. The town of Orleans last week admitted the low birth of Joan, and saw in it a reason for giving the foremost place to trades corporations. A young blacksmith led off in the processional pageant as bearer of the white and yellow flag of Orleans. Fine-looking supers might have been better for spectacular purpose than the notables and magnates who marched behind him—senators, deputies, town and county councillors, masonic venerables, university dons, hospital surgeons and physicians, and what not. The band of the Garde Républicaine, fetched purposely from Paris, divided the sections sacred to the Maid from that representing the upper grades of the Civil Service and the elected bodies. Fanfares screeched out clarion-like notes of jubilant triumph. What in the way of sound is so stirring as a French military fanfare? It raised her out of herself, and out of the humdrum of a Court in which everything went by rule. The Maid's section embraced la crème, all in robes or uniform. Ushers sent down from the Foreign Office saw to the marshalling of the many notabilities. The garments of the Foreign Office usher only differ in the steel chain round his neck from black Court dress. They were hedged round with artillery. Draw from this what inference you please. The young gentlemen from the Artillery School of Fontainebleau walked behind the guns at the rear of this section. They found themselves immensely popular.

The birth of the new heir to the Spanish throne obliges Prince Charles of Bourbon to lay down the courtesy title of Prince of Asturias, and throws his two children farther into the background. It invests the young Queen with increased importance as a possible regent. They say here that she intends to be the wet nurse of this heir apparent. A Navarrese woman would discharge the function better. Navarre produces magnificent viragoes. They are prompt to avenge themselves with the knife on faithless lovers or husbands, but are devoted to their offspring or any nurslings who may be entrusted to their care. The wife of Salamanca, the Spanish railway king, had twenty-four children and always hired Navarraises to nurse them. She sometimes had as many as three of them at a time in her service, but took care never to favour in the least one above the other. A shapely lady-like figure is now of great importance to a Queen of Spain. That lay figure aspect of Queen Christina rendered her good service whenever she opened the Cortes.

A PEER AMONG THE PLOTTERS.

I KNOW you like having exclusive information about what is going on, and I have got a piece of news for you that I expect will send your circulation up no end. It is about America, and it is about a huge conspiracy to change the Constitution there. I am one of the conspirators—or Jessie is, which comes to the same thing—and of course she has taken the most terrific oaths of secrecy, which is how I come to be able to tell you about it. I expect you know that my brother William is married to an American girl—Miss Hook she used to be, one of the old Knickerbocker families, and a millionairess, of course. She never cared for me much, because I did her rather a bad turn by recovering from an attack of typhoid that I had just about the time they were married. I have always suspected that Billy made it out as being worse than it was—anyway, she married him. But only last week she came along to Jessie—who she ought to hate, of course—and wanted to kiss and be friends, and all that sort of thing. Jessie soon found out the reason, which is that she expects to have a much higher title than Countess inside of a year or so, and that she thinks we can help her to it.

I expect you read in the papers a day or two since about a movement they've started in Boston to make Roosevelt perpetual President of the United States, with power to appoint his successor. That was the first step of the conspiracy, which is altogether about the queerest and most up-to-date sort of plot I've ever heard of. In the first place, all the conspirators, or nearly all, are women, and in the second they are all millionaires. What they want to do is to turn the United States into an Empire, and they are going to try to do it by starting a huge limited company or trust. As far as I can make out, their argument is that you can buy anything in the States, if only you've got money enough; you can buy a judge or a policeman, or a Senator or a State Legislature or the United States Senate—it is only a matter of price. Of course, I don't know whether this is exactly the case, but from things I've heard I shouldn't wonder if there was something in it. Anyway, they think so, and they are so sure of it that once their preliminary arrangements are made, they aren't going to keep their conspiracy a secret at all, but rather the other way, to boom it in the newspapers for all they are worth. The conspiracy is simple enough, so far as the details go. They are going to raise a capital of a thousand millions of dollars—or as much more as may be necessary—and buy up the United States in order to turn it into an Empire with Mr. Roosevelt as the first Emperor and Miss Alice Roosevelt—Mrs. Longworth, that is to say—as the second. When I say buy up the United States, of course I mean that part of it which has any say in running things. Of course, they aren't going to worry about what they call the Common People over there. Nobody cares what they think, because, it seems, they always do what their Ward Politicians—sort of local party organisers—tell them to do, and, so far as I can make out, pay them so much a head for doing. But they are going to buy up both the political parties, and all the officials and army officers, and Senators, and saloon-keepers, and Labour Union officials, and judges, and all that sort of person, get their lowest price out of them and pay it without grumbling, meaning, of course, to get their profit when the Empire is firmly settled. Of course, all the Trusts will help them, because most of the money will be found by them, indirectly, and they have everything to gain by the change. As soon as the financial end of it is fixed up, they will just have an election—so as to make everything legal—crown the Emperor Theodore I., and start reorganising things on the new basis.

The first thing they are going to see about is granting themselves titles. Only shareholders in the Conspiracy Trust will be eligible, and their rank will be according to the amount they've subscribed. There isn't to be any title below a Duchess, and you must have taken up at least one million dollar shares to get that. Then they will rise up, through Grand-Duchess, Arch-Duchess, Arch-Grand-Duchess, Imperial-Duchess, Imperial-Arch and Imperial-Grand-Duchess, and Imperial-Arch-Grand-Duchess, till they get to Princess, and so on, through the same sort of grades up to the highest, or Imperial-Arch-Grand-Princess. That, of course, will be reserved for the biggest shareholders, and there will never be more than two at a time. They meant at first to have only one, but that threatened to wreck the whole thing, because two ladies—a Mrs. Robfellow and a Mrs. Carnifix I think their names were—each insisted on having the highest possible title, and vowed that if they couldn't they would use all their influence to keep the conspiracy from ever being properly boomed. So they are each to have it, and to pay two hundred million dollars for it.

You will have noticed that the titles are all to be on the female side, and they are to descend through the daughters instead of the sons. Mr. Roosevelt is to be the first Emperor, but only because he is popular and rather a vigorous sort of person, and they feared that, being in possession already, he might make things rather awkward if they tried to get rid of him. But at his death the crown is to go to Mrs. Longworth (née Roosevelt) and to her female descendants. I don't know if this means that they are working in with the Suffragettes over here—Jessie rather thinks it does—or that their husbands are too busy making money to care about conspiring. But those are the facts, and I must say that they are putting a lot of energy into their scheme. For instance, they are going to have a shot at getting foreign capital as well as American. That was one of the reasons why Billy's wife, who is one of the ringleaders, came along to Jessie. They think we can both help them no end in England. First of all, they want me to join the English Board of Directors, because they think a title always attracts English capital (I only wish I had found it so). Then, again, they want Jessie to bring in "gags" about it in all the parts she plays and popularise it that way. And they want me to organise their English Press Bureau, which is to work the English Press and make it puff them up. They have got it into their heads that I must be a great swell in the journalistic world because I write for TRUTH, and it isn't my business to undeceive them. And they are going to try to get the clergy, of all denominations, to preach in favour of it by offering them, or those that haven't got them already, honorary D.D. degrees in American universities without any entrance fees. And all that sort of thing. They expect that the press will be disposed to be favourable because they are going to insert full-page ads. in every paper in the three kingdoms on the day they float their scheme, and once a month afterwards until it comes off. They are not forgetting the other European countries either. They are quite sure of getting the Kaiser's benevolent interest by offering to set up a life-size statue of him in the Capitol at Washington, with an inscription setting out that he is not only the greatest European that ever lived, but the greatest everything else as well. And they expect to get the French on their side by offering to guarantee that a certain number of American tourists shall visit Paris every year, once the American Empire is proclaimed—at least twice as many as go now, and each to spend at least twice as much as their present average.

I could give you ever so many more details, showing how carefully they have arranged their conspiracy—even to the exact amount of profit that will be available for dividends during the first year after the declaration of the Empire. They are going to put a tax of one cent in the dollar on everything that is either bought or sold in the United States, and they expect to be able not only to pay a dividend of 10 per cent. on the ordinary shares, but to find the Emperor's Civil List out of it as well. They have some sort of idea of widening the sphere of their operations when they've got things properly fixed up in America—setting up subsidiary Trust Empires in other Republics, and replacing unpopular Emperors of the old kind by new ones of their own manufacture; but that part of it is only in the air at present. There is only one point they are at all doubtful about, and that is how Mr. Roosevelt will take it. They haven't approached him about it, officially, as yet. But they have some sort of idea of offering to guarantee that if he accepts the Crown, every American family shall have at least six children in future, under penalty of banishment, and getting round him that way. That's all I know about the company so far, but if you look at the front page of all the ha'penny papers about six weeks hence, and then read how they all crack up the proposed New American Empire in their leader-columns, I expect it will astonish you. And so does Jessie.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE Pilgrim Fathers, dear Lady Betty, crossed the Atlantic, and founded New England; the Pilgrim daughters have re-crossed the Atlantic, and have created the New English. It is a composite John Bull that occupies this country now, who might more correctly be described as Jonathan Bull. It would be difficult to separate the elements that mainly compose his character at the moment; those that are his by inheritance from those he has acquired from Jonathan.

There are two scenes in this performance in the immediate past.

Scene I.—Thirty years ago there was one community that the English abominated more than any other: that of the United States. That is saying much, for we abominate all our fellow-creatures—especially each other. America was a British colony that had rebelled successfully, had humiliated the Mother Country, and had been formed by obscure emigrants; was Republican; was supposed to be in sympathy with the Fenians; was new in its principles, conduct, and methods; and was essentially "Vulgar" in its instincts. "Vulgar" is an abusive word which is characteristic of the narrow-minded—and is mainly used by them, and is as capricious as they are; a person, a mannerism, a condition, a custom, or a thing may be "vulgar" to-day, and most felicitous to-morrow—or the reverse may occur.

It was some thirty years ago that the day-break of new circumstances in England caused the value of land to diminish here, and the importance of the rich manufacturer and contractor to increase in the eyes of the Government. Those circumstances entailed the undermining of the "Upper class" by the "Middle class."

Several beautiful, and reputedly wealthy, American women had attained considerable social prominence in Paris in the late 'sixties, many had married well, and some of their successors had made substantial alliances in England. It is a generally accepted proposition here that an English title must be kept up, even if that has to be done at the expense of—others. Several Peers married American women, and boat-loads of the latter were unshipped at our ports during the next ten years. The Republican woman of the United States is Republican in everything—except her love for the Republic.

It was imagined that it was a tidal-wave of wealth; it may have been, but, in that event, much of the specie has not been surrendered yet!

Scene II.—The American woman, as a peeress, has had the courage of her characteristics. She has not adapted herself to her surroundings, but has adapted her surroundings to herself. Independence was improper; she has considerably increased the independence of her English sisters. Intelligence was an affectation, amongst women; it is now an admirable quality. Extravagant dressing was discountenanced, publicity was avoided, and ambition ceased at marriage; the American woman has altered all that. She has created a new English girl, a new English wife, and a new English mother.

Change the woman, change the man. There is a new Englishman as the outcome of that development, and of contemporary circumstances. He, too, is partly formed on the American pattern. His mind, time, and activities are absorbed in the accumulation of money; his standard of value is money; he prefers to gamble for money to obtaining it by mere manufacturing or ordinary trading; he aims at hitherto unthought-of amounts; he is increasingly inclined to be unscrupulous; and he tolerates almost any circumstance, or conduct, that has money to support it.

There is this material difference between America and England that must not be ignored; America is a new country with the faults of a new system; it is steadily forming its national character, and removing the failings of its condition as a beginner. England is an old country with the faults of an old system. Its character has been formed through the ages by climate, the Constitution, class distinctions, its insular condition, and many other circumstances. The failings of the incomplete in New England added to those of the complete in Old England may make a not wholly satisfactory condition.

It does not say much for the stability of our system, our faith in its perfection, or the resisting power of the English woman that a few boat-loads of intrepid Pilgrim daughters, supported by a few bag-loads of dollars, should have—even with the assistance of contemporary circumstances—so completely remodelled the character, conduct, and customs of our women and of our men. There has been a second surrender of Cornwallis; the last, not to Washington and Green, but to the American woman and green-backs.

* * * * *

Those who wish us ill may be divided into three classes: friends, enemies, and relations—and the last are the worst.

. . . . . .

Many hate their friends more than their enemies; they can forgive the injuries the former do them, but cannot the slights of the latter.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

I WROTE as follows a fortnight ago about the Chester Cup:—"In my opinion the Chester Cup is a good thing for M. Caillault's Querido. He is a smart horse and a really good stayer, and this race appears a positive certainty for him after his recent running in France." It was really a case of he who runs may read, and yet nearly all the papers ignored Querido, and predicted the success of either Torpoint, Bridge of Canny, or Bibiani. It was simple lunacy to suppose that Lord Derby's horse could give 19 lb. to such a horse as Querido, who, indeed, would probably beat Bridge of Canny at even weights over this distance. I never remember more infatuated folly, and the fancy of the press for Bridge of Canny was certainly not shared by that horse's stable. It was beyond all possibility for Bridge of Canny (or any other horse in England) to give such an amount of weight to Querido. The fact is that the French horse was ridiculously handicapped, considering his highly respectable form of last year. It was also a flagrant error in the conditions that there should be no penalty for winning any weight-for-age race except the Two Thousand or the One Thousand, which was altogether an absurdity of the most foolish kind. Querido won with extreme ease, and it would be difficult to estimate the amount of weight which he had in hand. The winner was most judiciously ridden by J. Reiff. I am informed that Querido is one of M. Caillault's sealed nominations for the Ascot Cup, and whatever beats him in that race will be the winner. The Chester race was run at a good pace, for Fairburn made running at his best speed for nearly two miles, when he was beaten. His jockey was abused for "riding his horse's head off," but any such criticisms are in the highest degree asinine. Of course, a four-year-old with only 6 st. 7 lb. to carry must make hard running from the start, when his most formidable opponents are horses which are all giving him a lot of weight. Bibiani ran creditably, but in my opinion Bridge of Canny was second best, and with Querido out of the way he would have won cleverly. We shall not see much more of Bibiani on the Turf, as she has been covered by Lord Bobs, and will be relegated to the stud in a few weeks. Torpoint, who, at the finish, was really the hope of those backers who would not go for Querido, ran respectably, considering his weight, but, instead of his giving 4 lb. to the winner, I fancy that M. Caillault's horse would find no difficulty in giving him 14 lb. One sporting paper announced on Wednesday that in point of class Bridge of Canny "stands right out," but it is impossible to understand how the "class" of Lord Derby's horse can by any hugger-mugger argument be shown to be superior (or equal) to that of Querido. The Chester winner ran last season against the best of the French and English three-year-olds, and he made Maintenon gallop at Chantilly and Spearmint at Longchamps. The fact is that there is nearly always a mulish prejudice against French horses when they come over to run in this country, and it is very seldom indeed that backers are encouraged by the sporting press to back them. One writer expressed the opinion that Querido was more likely a plater than a flyer, which was idiotic drivel, and really a quite unpardonable aberration, considering the horse's form in France.

It has been stated that the only winning horse hitherto sent over from France to run for the Chester Cup was Vasistas, who carried off this handicap for the late Baron Hirsch in 1891. Vasistas was a French horse, but when he won at Chester he had been trained for a considerable period at Kingsclere by J. Porter. He was purchased for an extravagant price by Baron Hirsch shortly after he had won the Grand Prix of 1889 for M. Delamarre, who bred him.

Since Ouadi Halfa's victory in the Poule Essai he has figured in the nominal Derby betting at 8 to 1. Only a crack-brained noodle will back this horse until he has arrived at Epsom. I have more than once warned admirers of Ouadi Halfa on no account to invest a penny on him unless they back M. Blanc's colt with a start. Ouadi Halfa is now in reserve for the Prix du Jockey Club, which is run at Chantilly on June 2, being Sunday in the Derby week. If the horse wins that race he will almost certainly be put aside for the Grand Prix on June 16, but, whether he wins or loses at Chantilly, it is altogether beyond belief that he can show his best form in England on Wednesday after having run a race (probably a severe one) in France on the previous Sunday. If M. E. Blanc's colours are seen out in the Derby it is quite on the cards that they may be carried by Myram, own brother to Jardy, who had very bad luck last Thursday in the Prix Daru at Longchamps, for which race he was regarded as a certainty. Madrée, winner of the French One Thousand, who was also heavily backed for the Prix Daru, is engaged in the Oaks, and I hear that she is likely to be sent over to run at Epsom. Madrée, who is by Flying Fox out of Maskery, is owned by Count Scheibler.

My Pet II. has returned to England, as he obviously has no chance of winning any of his more valuable French engagements, and he will be prepared at Newmarket to run at Ascot. It is quite certain now that Mr. Raphael's colt cannot stay. He has two engagements on the second day at Ascot—the Biennial, of £1,660, which is run over the Old Mile, and the Ascot Derby, the distance of this race being one mile and a half. My Pet II. has incurred a penalty of 8 lb. for the Biennial, but he would have no extra weight to carry in the longer race, for which there are forty-six entries, and it will be worth £1,800 even if only six start. All Black, Linacre, Slieve Gallion, Olympian, Simon Square, The Welkin, Prince of Orange, and Dripsey are the pick of the lot. Slieve Gallion certainly will not run for this race, and the others are an exceedingly moderate lot. The entry for the Biennial includes Linacre, Silver Heeled, Hillsprite, Hymettus, Sixty, Galvani (12 lb. extra), Bellavista, Stron Ard, Auber, Prince of Orange, The Welkin, Dripsey, and Maya.

Sagamore has recovered from his recent accident, and he has resumed work at Newmarket. The colt will not start for the Ascot Cup, as he could not be prepared for such a race, and, indeed, it is very doubtful whether he has any pretensions to stay the course. Sagamore may still be seen out on the Cup day at Ascot, as he was entered on October 30 for the New Biennial for two and three years old, which is run over five furlongs. This race will be worth about £1,160, and the entry includes Linacre, Silver Heeled, Bellatrix, Hill Sprite, Saxham, Slieve Gallion, Chestnut Sunday, Bilton Park, Stron Ard, Auber, and Jubilee. Slieve Gallion is not likely to be seen at the post, as he will (if all right) fulfil another engagement on that afternoon—the St. James's Palace Stakes.

I expect that both My Pet II. and Sagamore will be entered for the Fernhill Stakes at Ascot, and Traquair, Saxham, and Bellatrix are likely to be found among the three-year-olds engaged in that race, while the list of the two-year-olds will probably include Sheelah and Little Flutter. Sheelah is a very smart filly indeed, and Mr. Joel must considerably regret his tragical error in having so prematurely struck her out of several valuable races, including the Rous Memorial Stakes at Goodwood. Sheelah, indeed, has at present no engagement until the Hardwicke Stakes at Stockton on August 21. It is lucky for her owner that there is no minor forfeit in the Buckenham Post Stakes at the Newmarket First October Meeting, so Sheelah remains in that race, for which there are twelve subscribers, and the stake will be worth £2,700, even if there are only six starters.

Twenty-seven horses are left in for the Manchester Cup, which race is to be run on Friday, the 24th. This handicap is worth £3,000, and it would assuredly have obtained more than fifty-three entries but for the crazy policy of closing the race on the first Tuesday in January. The top weight is Llangibby (9 st. 6 lb.); but Mr. Neumann's horse is a very doubtful starter, and, in any case, he cannot possibly be got fit for any such race. Spate (7 st. 12 lb.) and Killeagh (7 st. 8 lb.) are both nicely weighted, nor is the Australian horse, Noctuiform, at all harshly treated with 8 st. 2 lb. If Mr. Buchanan's steed has now recovered his Australian form, he ought to win this race, and Killeagh appears to me to be the pick of the others. Sir Ernest Cassel's horse will be in better condition than when he won the Babraham Plate at the Newmarket Craven Meeting, and he will be well suited by the course, and is sure to stay the distance.

Entries close next Tuesday for some important races at Ascot. The Gold Vase, distance two miles, is worth £200, with £400 added for the winner, and £100 for the second. The White Knight, who won this race last year, will no doubt be again entered. He has incurred a penalty of 5 lb. for winning the Newbury Autumn Cup. Bridge of Canny may also be entered, but he will have to carry 10 lb. extra for winning the rich Gatwicke Stakes last October. The Royal Hunt Cup, one of the most popular handicaps of the year, and always a very picturesque race, has £1,500 of added money, with a piece of plate value £300. The deduction of £400 for second and third horses is extravagantly large. The Fernhill Stakes for twos and threes (five furlongs), has only £300 of added money, and the endowment of this race should be increased to £1,000. It is also difficult to understand why only £500 is added to the Wokingham Handicap (six furlongs), when £2,000 is fuddled away on the Ascot Stakes, a race which rarely brings out any horse of high class. The Wokingham, moreover, is the only T.Y.C. handicap in the programme.

The two-year-old races at Chester resulted precisely in accordance with my predictions, Llangwm, Quelpart, and Pastry winning the Badminton, Stamford, and Ormonde Plates respectively. Lord Sefton's Duegna was favourite for the Mostyn Plate, but she got off very badly, and never could catch Heredity, who won cleverly, thanks to the advantage which she had gained at the start. Pastry started at the satisfactory price of 11 to 2, thanks to the craze for Pearl of the Loch, who was beaten

OVER-STOUTNESS is not difficult to permanently cure when the right remedy is found. Antipon is now in universal favour. by a head after a most exciting race. The running of the King's filly at Epsom had proved her to be very moderate, and there was no justification for the general plunge on her for the Ormonde Plate. I fancy that Llangwm was the only really smart two-year-old which ran at Chester.

The Chester Vase of £2,100, which stake was run for this year for the first time, cost the fund £1,051, but there was something to show for this outlay, as there was a fair field and a most palpitating finish, which ended in a dead-heat between Sancy and Earlston, and Mr. Bass's horse was certainly unfortunate in not winning outright. Sancy's performance was an excellent one, as he was giving Earlston 13 lb. over and above the ordinary weight-for-age. Dusty Miller was withdrawn from the Two Thousand in order that he might be kept fresh for this race, and he was heavily backed, but he ran miserably, and it is clear that he is an exceedingly moderate colt.

Wool Winder had only Doryanthes to beat in the Dee Stakes, and Colonel Baird's colt won with extreme ease. I expect that Wool Winder will turn out to be the best of the Newmarket horses for the Derby, in spite of all the eulogistic chatter about Galvani, whose admirers overlook the fact that absolutely nothing whatever is known about the present form of Major Loder's colt. As a matter of fact, Galvani's gallops at Newmarket have not been extended beyond one mile and a quarter, and the animals which have accompanied him are very moderate. He goes, however, well enough, and he has improved in appearance during the last month.

Galvani has been left in for the Grand Prix de Paris, the minor forfeit for which stake has just been declared. Major Loder is also represented by Adora, Weathercock, and Baltinglass. Olympian has been withdrawn, Lord Wolverton has accepted with Prince of Orange, and Galleot is left in. Among the French lot are Ouadi Halfa, Myram, Passeur, and Mordant II. (all these colts are engaged in the Epsom Derby), and Madrée, Perspicacité, and Pulchela are the fillies left in for the Grand Prix which are engaged in the Epsom Oaks.

The Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap has excited very little interest this year. The race promised great things when the acceptances were announced, but the fine field which was then a possibility collapsed entirely. I announced many weeks ago that Polymelus would not run, and the miserable performance of Keystone II. in the March Stakes at Newmarket showed that Lord Derby's mare was backward and out of form. Sagamore, who was regarded by many good judges as the pick of the handicap, met with a slight accident, and was scratched. Meadow Rue was withdrawn in favour of Gingal. Velocity's chance was considered by cool-headed critics to be settled decisively by a penalty of 10 lb. Malua, who at the finish was the hope of Newmarket, went "off" a few days before the race was run. Mr. Faber's horse, however, is sure to win a good handicap later on in the season. The way had been nicely cleared therefore for Polar Star, and Mr. Hall Walker's colt won easily from the Duke of Devonshire's colt by Marco out of Lady Villikins, while Dalkeith finished third, and this horse carried 10 lb. extra for winning the Newbury Spring Cup. The creditable victory of Polar Star will make the Coronation Cup at Epsom, a most interesting race, as Mr. Hall Walker's colt will there meet Polymelus and The White Knight, besides Beppo and Troutbeck, and most likely Keystone II., who will then be in better racing condition than when she was beaten at Newmarket. Velocity was giving two stone to Polar Star on Saturday, but at Epsom they will meet at 20 lb.

Next week there will be racing at Hurst Park (two days), Redcar (two days), Wolverhampton (two days), Birmingham (one day), Manchester (three days), and Brighton (two days). There ought to be some good racing at Hurst Park and at Manchester, but the sport at the other meetings is not likely to be of any general interest.

There were originally fifty-eight entries for the Whitsuntide Plate of £1,000 at Hurst Park, a mile race for three-year-olds, but only fourteen have been left in, Galvani being one of the lot. Major Loder may run his Derby colt in order to give him some sort of public trial, as Galvani will have no extra weight to carry. There is another three-year-old race on the second day, also of £1,000, distance six furlongs. Fifteen are left in, out of an original entry of sixty-nine. Traquair may be able to win this stake, in spite of a penalty of 10 lb.

Lord Rosebery ought to win the Laughton Plate at Brighton with Lucian. There is a remarkably large acceptance for this race, thirty-nine having been left in out of fifty, so that the subscribers contribute £128 towards the £200 which is the nominal endowment of the stake.

At Manchester, forty-three two-year-olds are left in for the John o' Gaunt Plate, the list being headed by his Majesty's filly Pearl of the Loch, but Littledale and Cinderello are the best of the public lot. The City Plate has an acceptance of thirty-seven, including Cinderello and Duegna. Twenty-one two-year-olds are left in for the Devonshire Plate, including Attraction. The Red Rose Stakes of £1,000 is a new race for three-year-olds, distance one mile and a quarter. There were fifty-five entries, and thirty-five are left in. Orby will win this race in a canter if he really has any pretensions to Derby form. If Mr. Croker's colt does not start, then All Black may be successful.

Now that the affairs of the C.T.C. are not so urgently pressing, I am able to devote my attention to one or two little matters to which correspondents have called my attention. Amongst these are a certain athletic affair at Birmingham University, the necessity of a second eleven for Surrey, and foot faults at Lawn Tennis.

At Birmingham, where there is a university, there is an undergraduate who, like unto Achilles, is swift of foot. He is also an International hockey player. He plays for England. Now this man has twice won a sprint race at his university, and if he had won it a third time he would have secured the challenge cup for himself. But the committee refused to accept his entry because the sprinter had played hockey for some other club instead of playing for his university. I am told that if the Amateur Athletic Association is appealed to it will be held that as he was the holder of the challenge cup he had, unless he had forfeited his amateur status, an indefeasible right to compete. The battle of Birmingham University, headed by the faithful seven against the A.A.A. would have been a glorious spectacle. I remember when the sports were started saying that I hoped no challenge cups would be won outright, and I advised the men of Birmingham to follow the example of those ancient and humble universities, Oxford and Cambridge. As a general principle I must say that I agree with the proposition that if a man is good enough to represent his university in one branch of sport and refuses to do so, then I would not let him take part in any other branch of sport. There is no other way of fostering and keeping alive the infant university spirit if men go gallivanting about and injuring the prospects of their university. For the same reason I was very annoyed with K. MacLeod, who, if he had properly trained, would certainly have won the sprint for Cambridge against Oxford. But he went on playing international football until less than a fortnight before the sports. When a man is at the university, whatever one it is, the university must come first. Otherwise the university is doing no good to him, nor is he doing any good to the university. If this simple proposition does not come naturally to men they must be taught it, and I do not care what any A.A.A. may say.

It is surely the affair of Surrey if the authorities choose to go to the expensive luxury of running a second eleven. It seems to be a luxury, and nothing more, for the policy of the county appears to be to include men in the first eleven who have not struggled upwards. Last year it was Hobbs, and this year it is Marshal. The laws of cricket permit these things to be, and there is an end of it. At the same time, this policy must take all the life and go out of the second eleven, which can only be regarded as a training-ground for other counties. Surrey cannot complain if the colts wander afield and seek fresh fields and pastures new. A second eleven of Surrey men who would come on for the first team would be a grand scheme. It would help to make county cricket something more than a mere name. But that is not the policy of Surrey.

The foot fault has been freely discussed in lawn-tennis circles owing to certain play in the covered court championships, and there is a lively dispute as to whether or not the linesmen knew their work and did it. The present rule is badly worded. The server must have both feet on the ground immediately before serving. But he need have only one foot on the ground when he serves. At the same time, he may not take a walking or running start. The mischief of the rule is that it lets a man serve from one foot, and I defy any man who has ever done any sprinting not to get at once into his stride if he serves from one foot. Of course, I am not referring to the sprinters who go down on their knees, but to men who start upright, as Hutchings did. You get a lovely start. I think that the rule should be both feet on the ground at the time of serving, and such service to be from a stationary position. I make the suggestion because an old sprinter who used to be very fast off his mark explains to me the perils that arise from having one foot in the air. He would let the man who could nip off from the mark after striking the ball get all the advantage of his pace, if he started with both feet on the ground.

The Lawn-Tennis Association has suffered a great loss in the resignation of the presidency by Mr. Collins. It was his tact that sailed the ship through troubled waters. He has done a tremendous amount of work for the L.T.A., and I read in the Sportsman that he might have reconsidered his position if the request had been unanimous, but it was not. In the interest of peace and quietness, and because I know it to be his wish, I have no desire to go further into the matter. I will only say that ambitious gentlemen will some day learn that self-effacement is essential to the success of any one who would undertake the responsible duties that devolve on any president of the L.T.A. Mr. Collins never shirked responsibility, and I know that he has done a very great deal of work to make lawn-tennis a genuine amateur game, which is more than can be said of some of those who have a great deal to say about trade influence.

While heartily congratulating Mr. Jay Gould on his success in the Tennis Championship, one cannot help feeling rather sorry for Mr. Miles, who was short of practice, and yet won as many games as his younger adversary. At the same time, it does seem a matter for regret that our other amateurs have not taken the trouble to train on. Some of them have time and ability, but not perseverance. In professional circles Peter Latham has come into his own again. He has challenged and he has decisively beaten Fairs. The way in which he has recovered his form is remarkable.

The London Athletic Club must be congratulated on having provided a very interesting evening meeting, in the course of which Thompson walked seven miles in the first hour and ran ten miles in the second hour. He was nearly three minutes in hand at the finish, and he was paced by the walkers in a sealed five miles handicap, in which Thames Hare and Hounds men competed, and by Judson, who ran over in the club's ten-mile handicap. Thompson broke into a run as soon as he had finished his walk, and he did a very fine performance. Only a few years ago twelve miles was the limit for motors, and even now country J.P.s think the pace outrageous. They might ponder over Thompson's times.

The Amateur Athletic Association has decided that handicappers may not sit on the committee. The handicapper is paid, and I believe, under the rules, he cannot work for nothing even if he wishes to. This is absurd. There is a good deal to be said in favour of the change. At the same time, I trust the committee will regard the handicappers as being trustworthy persons who can really advise as to the genuineness of athletic performances. Some runners require looking after. I wonder if the committee will be a stepping-stone to the emoluments of the handicapper. Some men make a nice little income by handicapping, and they do their work wonderfully well.

The cricket season has begun in a regular mixture of spring, summer, and winter weather. Hayward has started off with a century, and Lees and Crawford bowling well, Essex were badly beaten. Lancashire look like having a bad time. MacLaren is not back from India, Spooner cannot spare the time, and W. Findlay (bat and wicket-keeper) is secretary at the Oval. At Cambridge there was not a single Etonian, and only one Harrovian in the Freshmen's match. Bottome looks like being a useful and punishing bat. He scored a century, and in college matches he has been making good scores. At Oxford the batting was much stronger than the bowling. If a little of the attention were given to bowling that is given to teaching batting what bowlers we should have! But then a youngster has not the stamina necessary for bowling at an age when he can become quite a useful bat.

Stock Markets Still Apathetic—Old Securities Neglected in Favour of New—Coming £5,000,000 Transvaal Guaranteed Loan—The Post Office and Irish Land Stock—A Public Issue Avoided.

THE Stock Exchange has spent another very quiet week, and the absence of public buying has caused dwindling prices in most departments. With business so slack, it was a relief to members to hear that the House would be granted a holiday next Saturday (Whitsun Eve). That speculative dealings have for the time being almost dried up needs no corroboration, but as I said a week ago, the public is no doubt investing on a fairly large scale, though the bulk of the business is being done outside the House, people subscribing direct for new issues. The Indian Government 3½ per cent. loan for £3,500,000 was understood to have been covered five times. The lists were closed just before the news of the native outbreak at Lahore, though whether that matter would have been sufficient to crab the loan is doubtful. Indian securities were temporarily marked down by the jobbers, but there was practically no selling, and at the end of the week the intelligence came through that, thanks to the prompt measures taken by the Government, including the arrest of the rebel leader, the revolutionary movement had been paralysed.

Following the Indian loan came an issue of £1,000,000 sterling 3½ per cent. bonds of the Agricultural Bank of Egypt, the principal and interest of which were unconditionally guaranteed by the Egyptian Government. The issue price was 90, and, allowing for the fact that redemption is to be not later than 1949, the yield is just over 4 per cent. The scrip is not available for trustees, but is gilt-edged for all that, and really, while investors can obtain 4 per cent. with safety and between 4½ and 5 per cent. on sound "second row" gilt-edged securities, there is no reason why they should rush into the speculative arena and load themselves up with stocks and shares of questionable merit. A Cape 4 per cent. loan for £2,000,000 was also part of last week's programme, but as this issue only runs for four years, and represents a renewal of bills that will shortly mature, it is hardly one with which the general public is likely to be much concerned. The probability is that the people who hold the old bills will be quite willing to exchange them for the new scrip. In the near future there is likely to be offered £6,000,000 of stock bearing the guarantee of the Imperial Government. Of this £5,000,000 will be on behalf of the Transvaal—which shows that General Botha has made good use of his time while in the Mother Country. The money is required for irrigation works, completing railway development, establishing a land bank, and other purposes. The remaining £1,000,000 for which the British Government will make itself responsible is on behalf of Jamaica, which requires to be put in funds to pay for the repairing of the damage wrought by the recent earthquake at Kingston.

The foregoing is a large enough catalogue of new public loans to go on with, and it is not surprising if the Stock Exchange still complains about the pace. A crumb of comfort for the House last week was the report that no Irish Land issue would be required for the present—£5,000,000 of such stock having been taken up by the Post Office. If the story be true, however, it means that the old Sinking Fund has been utilised to relieving the Post Office of an equivalent amount of Consols, in which case the dealers in Goschens who were hoping to see a good deal of the Government broker in connection with anticipated purchases in the market for Sinking Fund purposes, will not perhaps be altogether pleased. There can be no doubt of the wisdom of such an operation from the Government's point of view. The Post Office would derive needed benefit from the replacing of a 2½ per cent. by a 2¾ per cent. stock at a price that would bring the yield up to nearly 3 per cent., and the Government would also gain by the avoidance of another fresh issue of Irish Land stock upon terms which, in the present condition of the market, would necessarily have to be onerous. Among Internationals, a feature has been the increased demand for Japanese bonds, which received a fillip from the statement in a Paris newspaper that negotiations have been proceeding between the French and Japanese Governments with the object of concluding an agreement by which the two Powers should mutually guarantee the integrity of their possessions in the Far East. This agreement, the terms of which are not yet settled, will be a corollary of the Anglo-Japanese treaty of 1902, and of the treaty which Russia and Japan are negotiating at the present time, and which also has for its object the maintenance of the status quo in the Far East.

Home Rails and Public Apathy—Suggested Reasons for the Present Stagnation—Great Northern Prospects—The Anomalous Price of the Deferred.

The Home Railway Market still affords the most glaring example of the present apathy of the public towards Stock Exchange securities. Throughout last week there was hardly a sign of life anywhere, if I except a continued modest inquiry for one or two preferred ordinary issues—particularly Caledonian Preferred—and the tendency has again been for prices to drift. Movements may be gathered from the following table:—

There seems a good deal of topsy-turvyism about the existing state of the market, for while traffic returns could scarcely be more brilliant than of late, and the Money Market has taken a decided turn for the better, the Railway Market goes on steadily drooping. It is not to be wondered at in these circumstances if people are puzzled and prospective buyers are deterred from entering the market for fear that something bad is about to happen. I have heard a good deal of irresponsible talk for the last year about the public being frightened away from home securities for fear of predatory legislation on the part of the present Government. That argument, however, if it ever had any plausibility, possesses less than ever now, for the public not only neglects domestic securities, but is doing next to nothing in any department of the Stock Exchange. Probably we get nearer the root of the matter when we remember first, the continued phenomenal activity of trade and industry which is locking up big amounts of capital that in quieter times would find their way to Throgmorton-street, and, second, the bargains that investors have lately been offered amongst new securities. A fresh element during the last two days telling against the market has been the revival of labour fears caused by Sunday's Hyde Park demonstration held under the auspices of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants. This matter appears to be given an exaggerated importance by the market, particularly when it is borne in mind what a small proportion the membership of the Society bears to the total number of railway men employed in the country; but the Stock Exchange is in the mind just now to make the worst of everything.

These factors, while effective for the time being in checking "bull" activity, cannot do away with the solid merits of home rails, judged by earnings and dividend prospects. When business in the House improves, as it is bound to do sooner or later, I cannot, for instance, think that speculators will continue to overlook such a likely stock as Great Northern deferred. Many of my readers are of the same opinion, as witness the following letter which has reached me from a Nottingham correspondent:—

Great Northern Deferred.

Sir,—As an investor I am quite at a loss to understand on what basis the market values the above at £41½, with four months' dividend in the price at that. The dividend for 1906 was £1¾ per cent. The Grantham disaster cost, so the Chairman stated, £30,000, and £5,000 extra was carried forward. These two items represent £35,000, and it only requires £42,000 to pay ½ per cent. on deferred. The traffics for eighteen weeks to (May 4) show £38,600 increase. Allowing for under-publication, and with nine weeks of this half-year still to come, the gross increase should approximate £70,000 at the end of June. Surely the company will make £7,000 extra profit out of all this (to say nothing of next half-year).

I notice London and South-Western Deferred is quoted at about £48, with only £10,000 increase in seventeen weeks, against Great Northern Railway's £37,500. Surely immediate prospects are greatly in favour of York Deferred at £41½. The quotations of Home Rails are very misleading, and I find from experience I cannot get a decent line of the stocks at Official List prices.

With the main contentions of my correspondent I am in full agreement. In regard to his statement about the Grantham accident, it is true that the chairman estimated the cost to the company at £30,000, but only £17,000 was specially allocated as compensation last year. However, allowing for the transfer of £10,000 to contingency fund, £7,500 additional subscription to superannuation fund, and the £5,000 increase in the balance forward, the total special items figuring in last year's accounts amounted to £39,500, which strengthens instead of weakens my correspondent's argument. An estimated gross increase for the half-year of £70,000 may be rather liberal, but a net gain of £7,000 is moderate enough, and of course only £2,500 is needed (assuming that £39,500 will be saved on special outlays) to show another ½ per cent. on the deferred. On the basis of a 2¼ per cent. dividend, York deferred could rise to 45, and still give a return of 5 per cent.

How to Operate in Stocks Successfully.—See Halford's Adviser (post free).—Palmerston House, London, E.C. Established 1869. Telegrams: "Monitor, London."

Even assuming that only 2 per cent. be paid in respect of the current year—an estimate which surely makes lavish allowance for increased cost of coal and materials and appropriations for betterments—York deferred would still give a return of 5 per cent. to those who purchased at the current price. My correspondent compares the quotation for York deferred with that of South-Western deferred, in order to demonstrate the relative cheapness of the former. But the anomaly becomes much more striking when Yorks are pitted against South-Eastern "A." South-Western deferred is a steady dividend-payer, the stock is well held, and if the immediate yield on the basis of the 1906 dividend is only 3½ per cent., there are "prospects" connected with the development of Southampton Port. Besides, last year was a bad one for the company, owing to the accident at Salisbury, which cost £30,000, equal to ¼ per cent. upon the deferred. Now as regards Dover "A." The stock at present gets nothing, it has in fact been without any dividend since 1899, and before it begins to participate another £20,000 net revenue is required to make up the interest on the preferred stock to its full rate of 6 per cent. It takes, in round figures, £40,000 to pay 1 per cent. on South-Eastern deferred, so that altogether £60,000 more is required in net before the stock gets even that beggarly rate. Yet Doras at the time of writing stand at 40½, or within ¾ of the price of Great Northern deferred. Why holders of the former, in face of these facts, should rest satisfied is to me incomprehensible.

GRAND TRUNKS STEADY WITH A STRONG APPEARANCE—CANADIAN PACIFICS—HOW THE SYSTEM HAS DEVELOPED—FOREIGN RAILS AND NEW CAPITAL DEMANDS—LEOPOLDINA PROSPECTS—BUENOS AYRES AND PACIFIC—WORKING ARRANGEMENT WITH THE ARGENTINE GREAT WESTERN.

Allowing for the unsettled tendency of American Rails and the heaviness of markets generally, the fact that Grand Trunk stocks last week managed to keep steady is encouraging and the best indication that could be afforded of the latent strength of the market. The dealers continue to find their estimates of traffics pleasantly falsified; last week's gain of £28,000, for instance, was some £5,000 higher than speculators had gone for. I am inclined to look for an early turn upward in Trunk issues. The ordinary will no doubt move to some extent in sympathy with the senior issues, but those who are thinking of buying to take up—which is the most desirable course—will get value, not only prospective, but already proved, by purchasing the third preference. Canadian Pacifics have, as usual, felt the draught from the Yankee Market, though, in view of the steady absorption of stock by real investors in this country, Canadas are probably becoming gradually less subject to the baneful influences of Wall-street. It is a welcome sign of the times as indicating the growing demand for the company's shares on behalf of small investors, that it has been decided to abolish the minimum charge of 2s. 6d. transmission fee. Shares may now be sent into the company's office at 62-65, Charing Cross, for remittance to New York for transference into the buyers' names at a charge of 2d. per share. The insurance against loss of certificates, for which New York used to charge 2s. 6d. per cent. of value for the single trip from New York to London, the company now undertakes to cover, for both the outward and return journeys, for 1s. 6d. per cent., and the single journey for 1s. per cent.

Some interesting facts bearing upon the development of the Canadian Pacific system have just come to light by the publication of a letter from Sir T. Shaughnessy to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The former's statement is likely to have an important effect in connection with the outcry that arose, as an outcome of the recent tremendous increase in the amount of traffic requiring to be handled, about the alleged shortcomings of the Canadian Railways. Sir Thomas states that at the end of 1901 the Canadian Pacific had 732 locomotives and 22,475 freight cars. At the end of 1906, the company had 1,204 locomotives and 37,467 freight cars, so that in these five years there was an increase of 472 locomotives and 14,994 freight cars, or about 70 per cent. in each case without taking into account the fact that each locomotive and each car was of much greater capacity than those previously in service. Altogether, the company during those five years put back into the property cash to the large amount of $72,000,000, an average of over $14,000,000 per annum, or about two and a half times the sum that they had received during the same period in dividends on their shares. Moreover, the company has on order to-day rolling stock equipment to the value of $11,808,751, and it is hoped to have it all in service before the autumn business commences to move. Sir Thomas, after recounting these facts, states that there is no disposition on the part of the Canadian Pacific to shirk its responsibilities or to fill its coffers to the neglect of the country, a remark that is surely well based.

The malady of new issues seems common to all markets, and the Foreign Railway department is no exception. United Railways of the Havana have recently been disturbed by the fresh financing connected with the absorption of the Havana Central, though the stock has since made a fair recovery; and as there is a reasonable prospect of their getting 7 per cent. next October, making 6 per cent. for the year, Havanas do not seem extravagantly valued. The Antofagasta ordinary stocks have been affected by the proposal to create another £1,500,000 Five per Cent. Debenture stock, and further amounts not exceeding £2,000 per mile of additional line acquired or constructed, and Leopoldina ordinary has also been under the shadow of an impending new capital announcement. This latter fear, coupled with the fact that some speculators had previously bought on anticipations—not realised—of an advance in the dividend, caused a sharp fall in the company's stock. According to the report for 1906, there was an increase of £56,700 in gross receipts, bringing the total up to £1,182,800, but as working expenses (exclusive of the cost of repairs in connection with the damage done to the line by floods) advanced by £4,400, the gain in net receipts from traffic was only £9,300. Federal and State guarantees, however, brought in £17,500 more. The Company had again had to transfer £50,000 to reserve for redemption of debenture stock, while £45,000, on top of £35,000 a year ago, has been deducted for flood damage repairs.

The big increase in working expenses is an unsatisfactory feature of the report, though not surprising in view of the recent experience of South American railways generally. Otherwise the report is encouraging enough. The Board states that it has under consideration proposals to improve the accommodation afforded by the railway and to extend the system, while arrangements with the Government of Minas are also being considered to extend the date at which certain of the lines revert to the State from 1950 to 1999. As regards the current year's outlook, the Company, thanks largely to the fact that the comparison is with the flood period of 1906, shows the handsome gross increase for four months of £127,000, while traffic prospects, according to the report, are bright; the coffee crop in the Company's district is larger, while an increase in sugar and cereal traffic is also expected. Further, assuming there be no more floods, the company already may be said to have £45,000 in hand towards an increase in the dividend, and it only takes £55,000 to give Leopoldina another 1 per cent. For these reasons the stock undoubtedly has excellent speculative possibilities, and the present dulness connected with the forthcoming capital emission ought to be the buyer's opportunity.

A matter of great interest for the Argentine Railway market, though in the present condition of the House it has passed almost unheeded, is the news that a Government decree has been issued approving the agreement whereby the Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway Company leases for a term of twenty years the Argentine Great Western, and also the Transandine Railway, which at present is operated by the Western. Negotiations to this end were commenced last autumn, and, in view of the inordinate delay experienced by the Rosario in getting its amalgamation with the old Central Argentine ratified, the authorities this time may be said to have acted with comparative promptness. At the same time, the present agreement differs from that of the Rosario-Central, in that it is not an absorption, but only a working arrangement between the two systems, devised, as the Pacific chairman has put it, "for the improvement of the joint service to the benefit of ourselves and the public." The Buenos Ayres and Pacific has during the last few years worked wonders in strengthening and consolidating its system: whereas the original line, which the company was formed to work in 1882, had a length of 685 miles, the company will now, through the building of extensions, the acquirement of the Bahia Blanca and North-Western, and the Villa Maria and Rufino Railways, and the agreement just entered into with the Great Western, control some 2,000 miles of line in one of the richest parts of the country. Although full details are not yet to hand, there is every reason to expect that the latest contract entered into will be beneficial to both parties, as it removes all danger of rate cutting, and should permit of a more economical working of the combined systems. AMERICANS AND THE LATEST HARRIMAN SURPRISE—BIG NEW CAPITAL ISSUES BY THE UNION AND SOUTHERN PACIFIC—A BEARISH GOVERNMENT CROP REPORT—NEW YORK CENTRAL—HOW THE ENORMOUS INCREASE IN EXPENSES WAS ARRIVED AT.

The event of the week in the American market has been the big new capital announcement on behalf of the Pacific roads. According to an official notification made last Thursday, the Union Pacific is to offer $75,000,000 Four per Cent. bonds at 90, convertible into common stock at 175 at any time between three and five years, and the Southern Pacific will offer to stockholders $36,000,000 of preferred stock at par to the extent of 15 per cent. of their holdings. The news came upon Wall Street like a thunderclap, and was responsible for a sharp break in Pacific issues. Had Mr. Harriman forgone for once his penchant for the dramatic and broken the news to Wall Street more gently—instead of allowing all rumours of additional capital raising to be semi-officially denied—he would not have been subjected to the torrent of criticism—much of it unreasoned and unjust—which his action produced. Mr. Harriman, in fact, has a financial past, and if he has any desire to live it down he is going the wrong way to work by seeming in any way to avoid taking the public, and more particularly the shareholders in his companies, into his confidence.

So far as the issues themselves are concerned, Mr. Harriman, in his statement to the New York reporters, who seem to be eternally dogging the footsteps of the Wall-Street magnates, had one or two remarks to make which go far to justify the new proposals. He estimates the Union Pacific's net earnings for the current financial year, after payment of taxes, at $32,465,000, compared with $30,318,000 for the preceding year, and the receipts from investments at $12,323,000, against $10,330,000. These results would give a surplus after the payment of dividends of $12,000,000. The Southern Pacific's surplus, after payment of the full year's dividend at 5 per cent., is figured out at $13,106,000. Mr. Harriman also stated that 1,628 miles of the Union Pacific system are not mortgaged, and that the company has $243,000,000 of free assets. Judging from the position as thus set forth the maintenance of dividends does not appear to be seriously prejudiced by the new capital proposals, and the respective boards, evidently as an intimation to Wall Street that Union Pacific and Southern Pacific common stocks are now definitely on a 10 per cent. and 5 per cent. basis respectively, have commenced to distribute the dividends quarterly.

Apart from the excitement in Pacific stocks, there was practically no feature of outstanding interest in the American Market last week. The persistent circulation of unfavourable crop reports kept alive a "bearish" sentiment, though trading was again on a narrow scale. How prices have moved may be seen from the following table:—

The monthly report of the United States Department of Agriculture, published last Friday, practically confirmed the pessimistic advices obtained through private channels. The area of winter wheat remaining under cultivation on the 1st inst. was 28,132,000 acres, compared with 29,623,000 acres last year, while the general average condition was 82.9 per cent., which compared with 89.9 last month and 91 last year. On this basis the total yield of winter wheat works out at 405,101,000 bushels, as compared with an actual yield last year of 492,888,000 bushels, so that, according to the indications at the beginning of the month, this year's harvest will show a decrease of 87,787,000 bushels. The publication of the figures produced considerable excitement on the Chicago grain market, and prices advanced to record figures for the season, while the reflex action of this movement was seen at New York by a general decline in stocks. It is not surprising that the crop news should seriously disturb the Stock Exchange, coming as it does at a time when most of the barometers are pointing to a contraction in the country's trade and industry, and when, owing to the successful demands of railroad employees for higher wages and shorter hours and the legislation recently enacted by the various States for a limitation of passenger fares to a maximum of two cents per mile, the proportion of net to gross earnings should exhibit a serious decline. The New York Central's revenue statement for March, upon which I commented a week ago, is still taken as a text by Wall Street when discussing the outlook. Of the increase of $2,755,000 in operating expenses for the month, higher wages accounted for $800,000, while $1,500,000 was paid out to additional forces of men employed chiefly on account of the reduction in hours of labour, together with the high rate of pay conceded at the beginning of the year. The balance of the increase — namely, $450,000—was attributable to the higher cost of fuel. Altogether, with the general earning outlook so impaired, and with the new capital output by the railroads again working up to a pitch that is surely taxing the resources of the finance houses, it would be unwise to look for any sustained rally in Americans yet awhile.

RATHER MORE BUSINESS IN THE KAFFIR MARKET—THE STRIKE OF WHITE MINERS ON THE RAND, AND THE QUESTION OF EFFICIENCY—INFLUENTIAL MINING DEPUTATION TO GENERAL BOTHA—TRANSVAAL GOLD OUTPUT FOR APRIL—NATIVE LABOUR POSITION—THE RANDFONTEIN AGITATION.

Some improvement as regards the volume of business transacted in the Kaffir Market has been noticeable during the past week, but the effect upon prices has not been of a character calculated to give much pleasure to holders of that class of security. Having regard, however, to the nature of the chief influence upon the tone of this market of late, those who are hopefully awaiting a steady appreciation in values have something to be thankful for, in that quotations, on balance, have not changed materially for the worse in the period under review. On the first news as to the strike of white miners on the Rand, the tone not unnaturally became depressed, but though the next few cables showed the movement to be spreading, no serious relapse in share values occurred, while on the receipt of rather better news the market was by no means slow to show an improved tendency. The course of prices during the past week has, in fact, afforded further evidence of the stability of this market and of the disinclination of the once very venturesome and successful "bear" element to remain uncovered for any time.

The strike of white miners is reported to be due to the Gold Fields group reducing the wages of its employees below the standard paid by the other groups and endeavouring to get three drills worked in the place of two. The men of a dozen of the producing mines are on strike, but other workers have been found to take their places, and gold production is still proceeding at these properties. Attempts on the part of the strikers to get the men at other mines to join them have failed in some cases, but it is too early to say that the trouble is not likely to assume larger proportions. It is stated, however, that in the Transvaal there is little public sympathy with the movement, the strikers' pay having averaged £2 per shift, and the annual wages earned by the machine men being from £450 to £700. The representatives of the various mining groups regard the present depressed times as a favourable opportunity to settle the thorny question of white labour and enabling the proportion of white to coloured labour to be reduced to suitable economic limits. For some time past there has been dissatisfaction in regard to the efficiency of the white miners on the Rand, and the strike is the outcome of the measures taken with a view to getting more work done for the high rate of wages paid by the mining companies. Employers on the Witwatersrand pay the highest wages of any mining community, but the efficiency, it is stated, is the lowest on record, excepting, perhaps, that of India. At the recent meeting of Rand Mines, the chairman had to complain that, so far from matters having improved during the last twelve months compared with 1905, there had been a decrease in efficiency. Comparing the skilled labour force of the Rand Mines group, he stated that the efficiency of the skilled white men had been reduced by 3½ per cent. in 1906, or, in other words, it had been necessary to employ 104 more skilled men to do the work than would have been required in 1905. On the other hand, the average monthly wage was £29 19s. 10d. in 1906 as against £29 7s. 8d. in 1905. Thus the work of the skilled men on the properties of this group cost in all £57,081 more than the same amount of work would have cost in 1905, an increase of 5.8 per cent. It is not surprising that the managements are unwilling for this state of things to continue. It is not the rate of wages paid that is complained of—the high cost of living on the Rand compared with that in other mining centres calling for a higher scale of pay—but what the employers do claim is that, in return for every sovereign they pay in wages, they are entitled to have twenty shillings' worth of work done. The other phase of the labour question—the matter of the retention of the Chinese or their replacement—has been the subject of an important address to General Botha during the past week. Lord Harris introduced to the Premier of the Transvaal a deputation of representatives of the leading Rand groups, but General Botha did not add anything to what he had already said in regard to the Government's attitude towards the mining industry. He assured the deputation that as soon as the Transvaal Parliament reassembled a definite statement would be made, and, if possible, he would endeavour to make a statement on this important matter before then.

Market men anticipated that the figures of the Transvaal gold production for the past month would make a comparatively good showing, and they have not been disappointed. The return shows that last month's output was only 1,478 oz. less than that for March, and this must be considered satisfactory, having regard to the fact that April was one day shorter than March. If the daily production is worked out, it will be seen that the April average is above that for the preceding month. The following table gives the monthly yields in fine ounces:—

As regards the individual results, the satisfactory feature is to be noted that all the East Rand subsidiaries —the Angelo, Cason, Driefontein, and New Comet—all show improved profits, the Cason's figures being a record for that mine. The Driefontein's profit is better by as much as £3,000, and the Angelo's earnings are nearly £2,000 higher, although less ore was treated and fewer ounces were recovered than in March. On the other hand, the latest return from the Robinson Deep is disappointing, the profit showing a drop of over £9,000 on the month. This is officially stated to be due to "decreased value of ore from some of the richer stopes." The individual returns for the last three months are given in the subjoined table:—

* Loss.

The native labour statistics for April are less satisfactory than for some months past, although 983 additional workers were obtained on balance, the returns for the earlier months of the year having shown a larger net gain. However, it was not to be expected that natives would continue to flock in at the recent rate. The supply of this class of labour usually improves during the first and last quarters of the year, and it will only be in the usual order of things if the number recruited falls off during the next few months. At the present time the working mines on the Rand which are members of the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association have as many unskilled labourers as they can employ, and as the chairman of the Association observed at the annual meeting held last month, this condition of things is not unprecedented, though it is not usual. It is a condition likely to recur from time to time with any fluctuating supply of labour, which militates against the extension of working facilities for the very reason that the labour is not permanent. A similar condition of affairs was experienced in April, 1905; then there were more natives than could be found work for, but four or five months later many mines were short of labour. Similarly, it is not impossible that when the large numbers of natives who have been contracting themselves during the last few months begin to go home, a shortage of labour will again be felt, unless, indeed, a failure of harvests in one or several districts forces out a sufficiently large number of natives to make good the wastage. I append my usual monthly table of Kaffir prices showing the movement on the period:—

The formation in London of a Shareholders' Committee and the passing of resolutions by that body in regard to the cost of management of the Randfontein Companies and the non-payment of cash dividends by the parent undertaking have drawn a lengthy statement from the board of the Randfontein Estates Gold Mining Company in Johannesburg. The full text of the cable will be found elsewhere in this issue, from which it will be seen that the directors plainly state that they will not allow any interference with their policy, "nor will they submit to any dictation from an irresponsible coterie of shareholders who know absolutely nothing of the conditions of things prevailing here." The policy of the management seems sound enough and it is pretty evident that energy is now being shown in connection with the development of the extensive property of the companies comprising this group, but it is unfortunate that the board couched the reply to its critics in such strong terms, as the attitude taken up is, to my mind, calculated rather to swell the ranks of the dissentients than otherwise.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS OF THE PROFIT-SHARING PRINCIPLE IN FIRE INSURANCE

A REMARKABLE INSTITUTION

FOR OVER ONE HUNDRED YEARS the ESSEX & SUFFOLK EQUITABLE INSURANCE SOCIETY has been conducted in the interests of its Policy-holders, carrying on the business of Fire Insurance on the equitable plan of charging ordinary rates of premium and dividing the profits with the insured; and so successful has the Society been that, for more than a century, it has returned in cash to its Insured Members from twenty-five to fifty per cent. of the premiums paid by them, and has accumulated funds which, compared with its Liabilities, make it one of the strongest Fire Offices in the Kingdom.

Under the provisions of the Society's special Act of Parliament, recently obtained, it is now enabled to do business in any part of Great Britain.

WHAT THE PRESS SAY:

THE TIMES.—"This . . . is now the only office which transacts general Fire Insurance business on 'mutual' or profit-sharing lines. The new constitution of the Society is almost an ideal one from the profit-sharing point of view."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"The interest income is much more than sufficient to pay the limited dividend to which the shareholders are entitled, consequently the whole of the trading profits are available for the insured."

STANDARD.—"It ranks amongst the oldest fire insurance companies. Take it all in all, it may perhaps be considered the most successful of any."

DAILY NEWS.—"A degree of strength which no other Fire Insurance Office has reached."

TRUTH.—"The methods of this Society seem to me admirably devised for giving fire insurance on the lowest terms to the best class of policy-holders."

ENQUIRIES

Persons desirous of insuring their property under this equitable system are invited to send a post card for full particulars of the Society's terms.

INSURANCE in all its forms is a matter of such vital importance to so many people that for a long time past I have been writing about it regularly every week. There is, however, so much to be said that I have decided to deal with the subject in a special Supplement; but even the space which this gives is far too scanty for adequate treatment. Perhaps, therefore, it will be well to refer to some of the articles which have appeared in the past twelve months, in which permanent aspects of the matter, as distinct from comments on current topics, have been dealt with. These articles may be regarded as filling some of the omissions from this Supplement, which would otherwise appear incomplete, especially in its treatment of fire and life insurance.

At the moment the matter about which everybody is asking for information is that of liability to domestic servants and other employees, and to this subject, therefore, I now turn.

THE NEW LIABILITY TO DOMESTIC SERVANTS.

Before July 1 every householder who employs a domestic servant ought to see that he is in possession of a policy which takes off his shoulders the risk to which he then becomes liable. The new Workmen's Compensation Act provides for very substantial payments being made to employees who are injured by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. Let me say, at the outset, that I am quite sure that the extension of the Workmen's Compensation Act to almost all employees is a thoroughly good thing, and beneficial on the whole to both the employers and the employed. As a mere matter of drafting the Act is probably one of the worst that has ever been passed, and it will need an enormous amount of litigation before a meaning is given to it by the judges. Since it directly concerns such a very large number of people, I will try to explain briefly what it does involve in regard to certain points, what it may involve in regard to others, and the best methods to adopt for providing against the liability.

The Nature of the Liability.

With the exception of industrial diseases, resulting from certain trades, employers are only liable in the event of injury by accident: they have nothing to do with illness. The cook may get the measles, but the employer is no more and no less responsible than he was before.

We are concerned with accidents which have three kinds of results: death, permanent incapacity, and temporary incapacity. Where death results from the injury the compensation depends upon three conditions. If the workman leaves any dependants wholly dependent upon his earnings, the compensation is a sum equal to his earnings during the three years next preceding the injury. If this sum does not amount to £150, then the compensation is to be £150. If three years' earnings amount to more than £150, then the earnings are the basis of compensation, except that the maximum payment is £300. From the capital sum that has to be paid the employer is entitled to deduct any compensation previously paid to the employed under the Act. I do not know what this latter clause means; presumably it refers to compensation during incapacity prior to death, which results from the same accident that caused the death. I scarcely imagine that if one of my servants had received compensation during past years to the total amount of £150, as the result of previous accidents, I should consequently be freed from any liability if some fresh accident proved fatal. I should certainly have to pay during incapacity resulting from a fresh accident, and so I suppose I should have to pay in the event of fatal injury. This reasonable interpretation of the Act does not, however, appear to be the verbal one.

If the workman does not leave any one wholly dependent upon his earnings, but leaves people partly dependent upon them, the amount payable is such as may be agreed upon, and in default of agreement, the amount is to be determined by arbitration. A dependant is defined as a member of a somewhat extensive family; it runs to wife, husband, father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, step-father, step-mother, son, daughter, grandson, granddaughter, stepson, step-daughter, brother, sister, half-brother, half-sister, together with, as far as I can make out, illegitimate children and illegitimate parents or grandparents, though I am not quite sure what the latter are. An illegitimate wife—say, for instance, a deceased wife's sister, who has been married in defiance of the law—is not apparently considered a dependant, an arrangement which seems entirely inappropriate.

If the workman leaves no dependants, the employer is only responsible for the reasonable expenses of medical attendance and burial, not exceeding £10.

The way in which the members of this numerous family are to get their compensation distributed among them seems somewhat complicated. It does not, however, much concern the employer, who can pay the money into court, and will be well advised not to pay anybody anything until at least six months after death, for fear of other dependants turning up.

It has been suggested that this provision in regard to dependants will make it difficult for people with families to get work, because employers will give the preference to unattached blessings, so that liability may be limited to £10, instead of possibly extending to £300. Inasmuch, however, as every sensible person will insure against the risk, and since insurance companies will not consider the number of dependants of an employee, I do not think there is much force in this suggestion.

If the accident results in incapacity which lasts less than two weeks, no compensation shall be payable in respect of the first week. This is a direct inducement to malingering. If a workman in the receipt of £2 a week were fit to go back to work at the end of the first week, he would get no compensation for the first week, and £2 for working during the second week; if he can prove incapacity for two weeks he will get £1 a week for compensation and be just as well off at the end of the fortnight as if he had done a week's work. The average workman prefers a week's holiday if the financial result to him is the same.

In the event of incapacity lasting more than a fortnight, compensation has to be paid from the date of the accident, at the rate of half the average weekly earnings, not, however, exceeding £1 a week; this payment may have to continue for life, and this life annuity of £52 is the heaviest burden for which an employer may become liable. In the event of only partial incapacity the amount that a man can earn is to be taken into account in settling the compensation.

In determining the amount of the wages upon which compensation is based, they are to be "computed in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated." It seems clear that in the case of domestic servants, for instance, the value of board and lodging must be added to the wages paid in cash, so that a servant who is receiving wages of £20 a year would probably be regarded as in receipt of earnings at the rate of something like £40 a year.

To Whom are We Liable?

I can ask this question but I certainly cannot answer it. Under the head of definitions the Act says: "Workman does not include any person employed otherwise than by way of manual labour whose remuneration exceeds two hundred and fifty pounds a year, or a person whose employment is of a casual nature and who is employed otherwise than for the purposes of the employer's trade or business, or a member of a police force, or an out-worker, or a member of the employer's family dwelling in his house, but, save as aforesaid, means any person who has entered into or works under a contract of service or apprenticeship with an employer, whether by way of manual labour, clerical work, or otherwise, and whether the contract is expressed or implied, is oral or in writing."

There is no doubt that under this definition workman means a domestic servant in regular and permanent employment, as well as such people as curates, clerks, and assistants in shops. It is generally recognised that a charwoman who comes at regular times would have a valid claim upon her employer in the event of injury by accident, but there is no unanimity of opinion as to whether a charwoman, jobbing gardener, or window-cleaner coming at irregular times to do occasional work, would have a valid claim against an employer. Personally, I think it is more than likely that the courts will give the Act as wide an interpretation as possible. The avowed intention of the Act was that pretty nearly every employee would be entitled to claim against somebody or other, and I do not mean to run the risk of having to pay an annuity for life to anybody who does any work for me. Even if a chimney-sweep or a plumber has no legal claim against me, he might possibly get into the hands of a shady lawyer who would work up a case which would involve me either in defending it or in paying something: I intend to let an insurance company take the chance of an action and of the meaning of the Act.

It seems quite likely that the words "otherwise than for the purpose of the employer's trade or business" may give rise to many disputes. If I tip a boy to post a private letter, perhaps I am not liable if he meets with an accident on the way, but if he is posting a proof for Truth I should probably be responsible. If a porter is temporarily engaged to carry the baggage of a commercial traveller, the traveller would probably have to pay for the results of an accident; but if the same man is going on a private visit the porter would not be employed on his employer's trade or business, and could claim no compensation. I feel by no means sure that the courts will uphold distinctions of this character, and it seems to me foolish to run the risk of having to defend claims or pay compensation.

Similar considerations apply to boarding-house keepers. Casual workers, who in a private house might have no claim against the owner in the event of accident, would have a valid claim against the boarding-house keeper in identical circumstances, since in the former case he would not, and in the latter case he would, be employed for the purposes of the employer's trade or business. A possible example of this is a cabman engaged by the proprietor carrying luggage downstairs for a visitor.

An "out-worker" means a person to whom articles or materials are given out to be made up, washed, repaired, and so on in his own home or on other premises not under the control of the person who gives out the articles; wherefore I conclude I am not liable to my laundress.

It will be noticed that while I, as an employer, am responsible to each member of the extensive family of any servant, I am not responsible to any member of my own family dwelling in my own house: I am responsible for my charwoman's grandson, but, except through me, she has not to make any provision for him, even though he works and earns money for his grandmother.

Other cases in regard to which I am not at all clear are the employment of a police-constable when off duty, and the employment of soldiers as officers' servants. "A member of a police force," and "persons in the naval or military service of the Crown" are excluded from the benefits of the Act. I do not know whether they are excluded from the benefits of the Act only when acting as policemen, soldiers, or sailors, or whether they are also excluded when cleaning windows or doing other odd work in their spare time. Once again it seems to me that employers should see that insurance companies carry the risk.

Yet other conundrums occur in connection with apprentices and articled clerks. The definition of workman which I have quoted above plainly includes them, but how on earth is their compensation to be determined? If an articled clerk dies through injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, the employer is liable to pay £150 if the clerk leaves any people wholly dependent upon him; but can a person who is earning no salary have anybody dependent upon him? Again, if an articled clerk is incapacitated by accident, and if he is under twenty-one years of age, with average weekly earnings of less than 20s., the employer must pay compensation equivalent to the full wages, not exceeding 10s. a week, but if the injured clerk has no wages the equivalent compensation is nil. We have not yet done with the injured articled clerk. The Act provides that "any weekly payment may be reviewed at the request either of the employer or of the workman," and "that where the workman was at the date of the accident under twenty-one years of age and the review takes place more than twelve months after the accident, the amount of the weekly payment may be increased to any amount not exceeding 50 per cent. of the weekly sum which the workman would probably have been earning at the date of the review if he had remained uninjured, but not in any case exceeding £1." Now, verbally this provides for what is to happen when a weekly payment is reviewed. If an apprentice earning nothing is entitled to compensation to the extent of 100 per cent. of his earnings he receives no weekly payment for compensation, and what does not exist cannot well be either viewed or reviewed. This seems to be the result of what the Act says, but what the Act may be found to mean I really have no idea.

It would be possible to keep on raising questions of this kind, which are of very distinct importance to a great many people, without being able to give any decided answers. There is, however, one further case to be mentioned which, like many other provisions of the Act, would be extremely hard upon employers were it not that insurance enables all the risks to be covered at a very small cost. "If it is proved that the injury to a workman is attributable to the serious and wilful misconduct of that workman, any compensation claimed in respect of that injury shall, unless the injury results in death or serious and permanent disablement, be disallowed. My gardener uses a ladder which I have warned him is unsafe, and not to be used; he gets a fall and is permanently incapacitated. My chauffeur smokes while seeing to the motor, and is seriously injured for life, whereupon I may be saddled with a payment of £52 a year so long as they live as a result of their disobedience of my orders. This provision at least has the redeeming virtue of being clear, whatever else may be thought about it.

This disobedient workman has the whip-hand over me in every way. In the event of my bankruptcy, his claim will be a preferential payment, and my other creditors would have to stand aside in order that he might be paid; on the other hand, the weekly payment, or a lump sum paid by way of redemption thereof, cannot be assigned, charged, or attached, and shall not pass to any other person by operation of law. He could get his compensation at the expense of my creditors, but his creditors could get no part of it from him.

Points about Policies.

Happily insurance is available to relieve us of all liability, but for the most part the policies hitherto issued by the insurance companies have not been of an entirely satisfactory nature. There is no complaint to be made of the cost of insurance, which, to cover the legal liability, is only 2s. 6d. a year for each indoor servant. This is an addition to the wages bill which few employers will cavil at. It is, however, very necessary to make certain that the policy which is taken really removes all liability off the employer on to the insurance company.

Compensation may involve an annuity for life, and should the insurance company at any time, even after paying for twenty or thirty years, fail to keep up the payments, the injured servant can, of course, claim from his master. It is, therefore, of the first importance that the financial stability of the company should be beyond question. There are a great many accident companies whose position is all that can be desired. Hitherto there has been nothing to prevent anybody starting an accident company, and there are many new small offices whose present position is financially weak, and others, which may be all right for the present, whose future is entirely uncertain. These doubtful companies can offer no advantages over strong and well-established offices, and these latter should alone be selected for employers' liability insurance.

Another point to which employers should give careful attention is the nature of the clauses in the policy and the prospectus which apply to casual labour. If a policy is limited to "domestic servants only," it would scarcely appear to be adequately comprehensive, even for a private householder, and if the meaning of casual employees is defined and limited by such words as "charwomen, gardeners, etc.," the insurance company would seem free, if they chose, to refuse to defend the claim made by a plumber or a carpenter and to refuse to pay the claim if it were proved a valid one. It may prove that such limitations as these leave the private householder fully protected against all liabilities; but a policy with limitations is not at all what the public want; the public should not be satisfied with them, and the insurance companies would be well advised to issue policies which are adequate and absolutely comprehensive.

If the companies think that the liabilities under the Act are less extensive than some people imagine, they should be prepared to satisfy the wishes of these cautious people—with possibly erroneous views—without making any extra charge. If, on the other hand, they think that a more comprehensive contract would involve extra cost, then they can adjust their rates of premium to anything they please, and the public will pay. The public want, and are right in wanting, a contract which will make certain that in no circumstances whatever can they incur a single penny of expense beyond the payment of the annual premium, as a result of injury by accident to any one who is working for them.

Of course, these policies usually provide that the insurance company practically steps into the place of the employer. The company pays all expenses, and has the right to take action in the employer's name; the employer must assist the company in every way he can, and must do nothing in regard to a settlement without the consent of the company.

The clause as to the employer notifying a company immediately an accident happens needs to be examined. Such a clause as "the insured shall give notice to the company of any accident within a reasonable time after the accident comes to the knowledge of the insured, and of every written notice or information as to any verbal notice of claim and all proceedings" is fairly satisfactory. A provision that notice must in any case be given within six days of the accident, and that the policy is invalidated if this is not done, is not satisfactory if it is meant to be adhered to. An accident may seem quite unimportant at the time of its happening, but serious consequences may follow, and, provided the employer has given reasonable notice of accidents as soon as he has any cause to think that any claim is likely to arise, the insurance company should be satisfied. Doubtless all respectable companies would take reasonable views in regard to such a point as this, but it is not to the advantage of the insured to take a policy containing unnecessarily stringent conditions, which might, if strictly interpreted, invalidate their claim against the company.

Another point that should be looked to is whether or not it is necessary to give notice to the insurance company as soon as any extra servant is engaged. A householder pays for, say, three servants, and for occasional and casual employees; in the course of the year he takes on a fourth regular servant. In some of the earlier policies issued by the companies it was necessary to send notice of the engagement of this extra servant, who would otherwise not be covered by the policy. I cannot pretend to have seen all the latest policies of all the companies, but I believe this condition no longer exists in most of them. The point should, however, be specifically mentioned in the policy, a satisfactory clause being such as the following:—"The insured shall supply the company with a correct statement of all employees employed during any period of insurance within one month from the expiry of such period, and if the total number employed shall exceed the number on which premium has been paid, the difference in premium shall be met by a further proportionate payment to the company."

Some, at any rate, of the policies provide for compensation being paid only in the event of the servant meeting with an accident while engaged in the United Kingdom. As far as I can see, there is nothing in the Act which would exonerate an employer from liability if, for instance, his chauffeur, engaged in England, met with an accident on the Continent while in his master's service. I am without an opinion as to whether it would make any difference if the chauffeur were engaged in France, but even if he were a Frenchman engaged in France, it is quite possible that his English employer might be liable. People who are at all likely to take their servants out of the United Kingdom should therefore make sure that, whether they are legally liable or not, the insurance company runs the risk of defending and, if necessary, paying the claim.

A good many policies are issued which provide for benefits of one kind or another in excess of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. By the payment of a slightly higher rate of premium it is possible to provide for half the cash wages of the servant, not exceeding £1 a week, and not continuing for more than twenty-six weeks, in the event of disablement from certain specified illnesses, such as fever, small-pox, measles, etc. A still higher premium will provide for medical expenses within specified limits, and many other extra benefits of one kind or another can be obtained by paying for them. In regard to such points as these, it must be remembered that employers usually pay their servants full wages in the event of temporary incapacity through illness, and, while I am not prepared to say this is a legal obligation in all cases, it is perhaps just as well that the insurance company should bear the expense in return for a very small annual payment by the employer.

Finally, it must be borne in mind that the Act prohibits contracting out—that is to say, a master and a servant cannot agree among themselves that the Act shall not apply in their case. Nothing whatever that a servant could say or sign could prevent him in the event of accident having a legal claim for compensation, either personally in the event of incapacity, or through his dependents in the event of a fatal accident. The only exception to this is when a special scheme, applicable to a considerable number of people, is adopted with the consent of the Registrar of Friendly Societies.

I have dealt with this subject at some considerable length, because it concerns so many people, both employers and employed. There is much in connection with the Act that I have not referred to, such as making claims and settlements and other points of procedure, as well as such matters as compounding by a capital payment for weekly compensation during long-continued or permanent incapacity; moreover, I have purposely refrained from any reference to seamen and employees in various unhealthy trades who can claim compensation for industrial diseases.

My main object has been to make clear the liabilities of householders, shopkeepers, and commercial firms; to show the imperative necessity of insurance and the practical points which ought to be considered in the selection of a satisfactory policy.

ACCIDENTS AND THEIR CONSEQUENCES.

The possibility of an accident involving financial loss is by no means limited to the case of servants. In certain cases we are liable to strangers for the consequences of our own actions or those of our servants. A carriage or a motor-car may injure some one, and we may have to pay. The cover of our coal-chute may be out of place, a passer-by may break his leg, and the expense may fall on us. And so in dozens of other cases unexpected things may happen which involve us in a liability to pay something to some one else. With the perversity that seems to characterise things in general, these events come off at the most inconvenient time, and then, of course, we wish that there was some one else to pay instead of us. The chances of injury to third parties are small, with the result that the cost of insuring against the loss they involve is infinitesimal. This suggests some considerations that apply to all forms of insurance and which are well worth attention: insurance of every kind is a plan of making small regular payments in order to avoid the possibility of occasional heavy payments. A sensible man's argument is that if a thing is extremely unlikely to happen, the cost of insuring against it is so small that it is wisest to insure; while if an event involving heavy loss is fairly likely to occur, and consequently involve a relatively heavy payment, the necessity for insurance is so imperative that the money for the premium must be found.

Accidents to ourselves are of even more frequent occurrence than accidents to third parties, for which we are responsible; a personal accident policy costs a mere nothing, but may prove an inestimable boon to either ourselves or others. People in general have the quaintest ideas about the frequency of accidents and the circumstances in which they most usually happen. Something like 12,000 males die annually in Great Britain from accidental injuries, and a lot of people suppose that a railway train or a steamship are the most likely places in which to meet with an accident. This is very far from being the case, and it would be easy to quote from the records of insurance companies any number of curious claims. People may seem fairly safe in bed, but in many instances a hot-water bottle causing a burn has resulted in the receipt of a cheque from an insurance office. It is not long since a man woke up to find his ear was bleeding and discover that he had been bitten by a rat; perhaps he did not mind very much since a cheque for £20 was the result. In these days of lifts to take us to underground railways, people's toes are often trodden on; a man who suffered in this way with a tumour as the result was awarded £70 under an accident policy.

By a curious survival of an old custom the compensation under accident policies is generally doubled, except in regard to weekly pay during disablement, when the injury results from accident to a train or a tramcar. A policy which guarantees to pay £1,000 in the event of death, or the loss of both eyes, or two limbs, or of one eye and one limb; and to pay £500 for the loss of one eye or one limb, in addition to £6 a week for twenty-six weeks at the most, in case of total disablement, and 30s. a week in the event of partial disablement, can be obtained for about £4 a year; while a very slight extra payment covers incapacity from various specified diseases.

In regard to policies which provide payments to ourselves or others in such contingencies as these there are, as in all other cases, important points to be attended to. One matter which correspondents not infrequently complain to me about is that an insurance company has refused to renew the policy. This is a quite reasonable provision on the part of insurance companies, since a man's condition may alter and the risk become considerably greater than it was at first. Nowadays, however, some offices issue policies which cannot be terminated till a certain age so long as the insured continues to pay premiums. This involves more risk to the companies, and it is appropriate that they should charge a higher rate of premium.

WHAT ABOUT ILLNESS?

I have never quite been able to make up my mind about policies which afford complete protection against financial loss in the event of illness of every sort and kind. I am entirely clear about the advantages of policies which, besides giving compensation for accident on the lines I have just been talking of, also give substantial payments, it may be, continuing for a year, in the event of certain specified illnesses. The annual cost of these policies is small and the advantages great; they cover, for instance, a substantial payment, say, £1,000, in case of total and permanent blindness or paralysis, even when not caused by accident. But a policy which would insure against illness of every kind, and which would continue so long as the resulting incapacity lasted, although frequently asked for, is scarcely a desirable contract. The cost would of necessity be extremely heavy, and, take it all in all, would hardly be worth paying for, even if there is such a comprehensive policy as this to be had.

INSURANCE FRAUDS.

Honest people fail to recognise the necessity for the conditions which appear in insurance policies. I am myself all in favour of abolishing restrictive clauses whenever possible, but I recognise the necessity of conditions which afford the companies adequate protection against fraud, and I know that it is perfectly safe to trust to the fair dealings of good insurance offices in regard to such points. The business is not really workable unless insurance offices of all kinds, especially perhaps fire insurance companies, are thoroughly protected against fraud.

When I get tired of detective stories I turn to a portly volume, published in America, full of thrilling swindles, and attempts at swindles, on insurance companies. The records in most cases are based upon proceedings before the law courts, and each one of the many hundreds of swindles which are described is substantially true.

Of course, accident policies afford a cheap method of trying to gain by an insurance fraud. There are two favourite methods employed, pretended death and self-mutilation. One young man in a good position reckoned he saw his way to get £2,000 for the loss of his left hand; he was quite ready to part with it at the price, and, having purposely shot it, claimed that the injury was an accident, which happened while loading a revolver preparatory to celebrating the Fourth of July. He had policies in several companies, and the officials, on comparing notes, found sundry discrepancies in the "corroborative detail calculated to give verisimilitude to an otherwise bald and unconvincing narrative." The ingenious youth had a bad quarter of an hour under cross-examination, and ultimately owned up.

In another case a man took accident insurance to the tune of over £5,000, and accidentally, in the dark, with no one by, had his left arm crushed by the wheels of a passing train. Some of his policies were merely one-day tickets, of course costing very little; the circumstances were suspicious, and his explanation that he took so much insurance because he was "afraid of dogs biting him" seemed a little thin.

Occasionally, but I believe very occasionally, people will commit suicide in order that the insurance money may be paid to their families. Of course, an equally lucrative, and not so unpalatable, arrangement for getting money out of both Life and Accident insurance offices is pretended death. One of the cleverest attempts of this kind was made by a man called Joel Pieper. He was shortly to appear on trial for burglary, but was out on bail. He had two respectable brothers-in-law, with whom he went in a boat on the Mississippi. These witnesses swore that he fell overboard while changing seats, that he only rose once some distance from the boat, and was never seen again. Counsel for Pieper's widow said he had investigated the case, and felt sure it was a bonâ fide one, and the company, who had issued a big accident policy on Pieper's life, very nearly paid up. An official of the company, however, started inquiries, and employed a man who knew Pieper well to act as a private detective, and tried to trace him. This man Brown started on the trail, and after a time began to hear news that Pieper had been seen since the accident. Finally, a long way from home, he came across Pieper, and wired to the insurance company without revealing himself to the drowned man, Pieper was arrested, and his wife and brothers-in-law were charged as participants in the fraud. Pieper claimed all the glory of the attempt for his own, the others were exonerated, and, needless to say, the company did not pay the claim.

It is not very long since the manager of a life office told me a story which, so far as I am aware, has not yet appeared in print. A highly respectable banker in a Continental city died and left two sons; one succeeded his father in the business, the other joined the Army, and was entitled to an income from the bank. The banker son speculated and got into difficulties, the officer was extravagant, and claimed from the bank advances which practically wiped out all his interest in the father's estate. The officer was enamoured of another man's wife, and a wealthy tradesman's daughter was enamoured of the officer. One Christmas time the officer went to his banker brother, demanding more money, and threatening to sell his interest in the bank if his claim were refused. The banker could not afford the disclosures that would follow such a sale, and promised to provide £1,000 a month for thirteen months if the officer would promise to marry a rich wife or commit suicide within that time. The banker thereupon took out two large policies on the officer's life. As the fateful thirteen months drew to a close the brothers again met, and the officer was reminded of his promise. His love affairs were in the same position as before: he could not marry the wife, he would not marry the tradesman's daughter; the banker suggested that the alternative was suicide. The officer, driven to desperation, persuaded the wife to promise to elope with him, agreeing to meet at a certain time and place. The banker, through a confidential servant, discovered the arrangement, and telegraphed to the officer in the lady's name, appointing a fresh rendezvous, whither the officer went. Finding no lady there, he supposed himself deserted by every one, and shot himself, in accordance with the banker's expectations. After decorous delay, the banker claimed on the insurance companies; but the lady who had meant to elope with the officer discovered the banker's plot, and without implicating herself revealed the facts to the insurance companies, who agreed to contest the claim. One company, however, paid up, while the other fought the case, with the result that the second office did not have to pay the claim, and the banker received a well-merited sentence of imprisonment.

Fire insurance companies are even more subject to attempted fraud than life or accident offices, and the stories which are both true and well founded are illimitable in number. I believe it is perfectly true that a man installed an elaborate set of fire-extinguishers warranted to put out the fiercest fire. In view of this precaution, the fire office reduced the rate of premium. One day a friend called, and, noticing the innovation, inquired what object there was in putting out a fire, since it is much more profitable to let it burn. His curiosity being whetted and still unsatisfied, he inquired what was in the cylinders, whereupon the proprietor replied: "Petroleum, my friend, petroleum."

"Moral hazard" is, in fact, a very serious matter for the fire insurance companies, and the only practical way of guarding against it is by the insertion of clauses in the policies which may seem objectionable to the ordinary policy-holder, but which are, nevertheless, necessary, not merely in the interests of the insurance companies, but also in the interests of the honest policy-holders who object to them.

language, and that, speaking strictly, you cannot insure against fire, or death, or accident. What you do insure is the payment of a sum of money when the contingency said to be insured against happens. Thus it is perfectly possible, and not very uncommon, to insure against the birth of twins. Such a policy provides that in the event of twins being born and both of them surviving a twelvemonth, an agreed sum of money is paid.

Eminently cautious insurance companies occasionally take what seem to be most extraordinary risks. The secretary of a well-known office once told me of a proposal which he received from a lady who would lose a substantial sum of money in the event of her marriage. She wanted to take a policy under which an equivalent amount would be paid to her if she committed this indiscretion. The obvious reply would be that the company might issue the policy to-day and the lady might marry to-morrow, but on reflection the lady was asked to send her photograph. It was produced at a meeting of the directors, and the chairman, after careful examination, passed it round the board, with the remark, "I think, gentlemen, we might take the risk." And they took it. The premium has been paid for many years, and no claim has yet arisen.

Among well-known subjects for insurance are, of course, such things as burglary, with or without responsibility on the part of the insurance company for larceny and the connivance of servants; insurance of bicycles and motor-cars; provision, at an extremely small cost, against accidents while travelling, together with compensation for damage caused by the explosion of boilers and the consequences of accidents from lifts and machinery.

Another large class of insurable subjects may be grouped under the head of "Investment Insurance." This title by no means covers all I mean, but then it is notoriously difficult to describe a complicated subject in a few words.

Among other things, mortgages and debentures may be made secure as to both capital and interest by means of an appropriate policy. The loss of legal documents, defects in title, forged transfers, and the infidelity of trustees and employees can all be insured against so as to provide for the financial loss being made good by an insurance company.

Even more remote contingencies can be guarded against, as, for instance, the financial consequences of a lunatic recovering sanity, a missing beneficiary turning up to receive what would otherwise come to us, or the loss of fortune through somebody marrying again or having children, so interfering with our legitimate expectation of coming into a nice little sum. We can even make sure that over-zealous teetotallers cannot inflict financial loss upon us by cancelling the licence for our public-house; and, as one of the most important modern features of insurance, we can insure against loss through fraudulent or incompetent executors, trustees, or solicitors.

I have had much to say at various times about the importance of the legal profession adopting adequate measures for protecting the public against the frauds of dishonest solicitors. Little by little, improvements are coming, and perhaps in the course of time things will be put on a more satisfactory basis than they are at present. If solicitors as a body are reluctant to take proper steps, the public seems equally indifferent. Some time ago, when there was a regular epidemic of frauds among solicitors of high standing, one of the insurance companies sent out many thousands of copies of a prospectus which seemed to me altogether admirable. The contemplated policy provided for the making good of any loss which might arise in connection with the policy-holder's estate or trust. A man was to appoint his own trustees to administer the estate, and his own solicitors to do the legal work; the insurance company was to have the right of inspecting all documents connected with the estate whenever they chose, and to guarantee the maintenance of the property intact and the punctual payment of the income. To disarm possible criticism, the company prefaced the prospectus with the sage quotation: "Inasmuch as I do none the wrong to mistrust any, I do myself the right to trust none." FORMS OF LIFE ASSURANCE.

Practically everybody is familiar with fire insurance, and as I recently devoted the whole of a weekly article to various practical points in connection with it, there is no occasion for me to refer to the matter in any detail now. I imagine it will be more useful to my readers to have told them everything that is necessary about domestic servants' insurance, and to have given a brief sketch of the advantages of many less familiar forms of insurance.

Somewhat similar considerations lead me to deal but briefly just now with the question of life assurance. I have much to say about this week by week, and in order to do the subject even approximate justice, life assurance would need a supplement to itself. The different kinds of policies that can be obtained are so varied, and the circumstances that can be met to the best advantage by means of life policies are so numerous, as to be practically inexhaustible; almost each case has to be dealt with on its merits. There are, however, a few characteristics of all forms of life assurance which are worth special attention. The first thing is the extraordinary security it affords. Professor de Morgan said long ago: "There is nothing in the commercial world which approaches even remotely the security of a well-established life office." Perhaps few people, except those who have given the subject special attention, realise the absolute convincingness of the reasons which make this statement literally accurate. They are worth considering. The vast majority of life assurance contracts depend upon mortality, and the records of the past enable us to foretell the future in this connection without chance of error. An insurance company has liabilities to meet, many of which do not fall due till a more or less remote future, and, within very narrow limits, the time and the amounts for payment are known. A life office, therefore, cannot be subjected to any extensive sudden claims in the same way that a bank is when there is a "run" upon it. This makes possible the investment of funds in permanent securities of a kind which are unsuitable for banks, and, moreover, the permanence of the investment tends to prevent a loss through depreciation in capital value—at least, in many instances. The market value of securities may fall, but a life office has no need to sell at low prices; it can hold the securities until they recover their value. Of course, this remark does not apply to all investments, but it is true in regard to a great many.

As regards the fulfilment of contracts under life policies, the security is uniquely strong for another reason. Every life office from time to time makes a valuation of its liabilties. This consists in calculating how much money it ought to have in hand now in order to pay the sums assured under the policies as they become due. Clearly these amounts will only be payable if the policies are kept in force by the payment of premiums; it therefore calculates the present value of the future premiums that it will receive, and deducts the present value of the receipts from the present value of the payments; this gives the net liability of the company at the present time.

In making these calculations two very important sources of security come in. If I have to pay £1,000 at the end of thirty years, I must have £477 in hand at the present time if I can only obtain compound interest upon it at the rate of 2½ per cent. per annum, in order to meet my liability when it becomes due. If, however, I could be sure of earning 4 per cent. per annum, it would be enough for me to have £308 in hand at the present time; it will thus be seen that it makes an enormous difference whether I reckon that I shall receive a low rate or a high rate of interest.

The estimate that I make of the future rate of interest does not affect my ultimate liability, and I might quite possibly be able to pay £1,000 at the end of thirty years if I set aside £308 for the purpose, but I am much more sure of having the £1,000 thirty years hence if I set aside £477. This is the sort of thing that good life assurance companies do, and that makes their financial position so exceptionally strong.

There is another source of strength as well. A policy-holder, in order to keep his policy in force, has to pay a premium of, say, £30 a year until he dies, but the insurance company, in calculating its liabilities, reckons that it will receive not £30 a year but only £24; the difference of £6 a year is technically called "loading," and is set aside as a provision for future expenses and profits. The future premiums that the company estimates it will receive are the net premiums, without any provision for expenses, and the actual receipts will be the commercial or prospectus rates of premium. The difference between the two in a good office is always considerably more than the actual expenses are likely to be, and thus constitute an additional source of security.

These points at once lead to another consideration, in which life assurance is different from anything else, namely, that in companies where the security is the greatest the profits are the largest. When a company, in its calculations, assumes that it will meet all its liabilities if the funds yield interest at the rate of 2½ per cent. per annum, and the company actually earns 4 per cent., there is a margin of £1 10s. per cent. per annum of the funds in excess of what is necessary for meeting the liabilities. This margin, or surplus, is available for distribution among the policy-holders in the form of bonuses. Then again, if a company calculates that it will only receive £24 a year from each policy-holder, while it actually receives £30 a year, there is a balance of £6 a year, or 20 per cent. of the total premiums for expenses and profits. The expenses only amount to perhaps 10 per cent. of the premiums, or £3 a year for each policy-holder, with the result that the remaining £3 a year—the remaining 10 per cent. of the premiums—is surplus available for bonuses. Thus in both these ways, and in other ways that might be mentioned as well, the margin, or surplus, constitutes a source of exceptional security, and the bigger this margin for security is, the larger are the bonuses which are available for the policy-holders.

SCIENCE v. LUCK.

Many of my readers will remember Mark Twain's account of how they decided in Kentucky that "Seven Up," or "Old Sledge," was not a game of chance. Some of the boys were indicted for playing this game of chance; counsel urged it was a game of science. The testimony on the point was equally balanced, and a jury of twelve was empanelled to settle the question. Four deacons and two dominies represented the luck theory, and six inveterate old "Seven Up" professors played for the science side of the issue, and this was the verdict: "We, the jury, have carefully considered the points of the case, and tested the merits of the several theories advanced, and unanimously decide that the game of "Seven Up" is eminently a game of science and not of chance. In demonstration whereof it is hereby and herein stated, iterated, reiterated, set forth, and made manifest that, during the entire night, the 'chance' men never won a game or turned a jack, although both feats were common and frequent to the opposition; and furthermore, in support of this our verdict, we call attention to the significant fact that the 'chance' men are all busted, and the 'science' men have got the money. It is the deliberate opinion of this jury that the 'chance' theory is a pernicious doctrine, and calculated to inflict untold suffering and pecuniary loss upon any community that takes stock of it."

For "luck" read "non-insurance." For "science" read "insurance," and hold it true that the uninsured "are all busted," that the insured "have got the money," and that the uninsurance "theory is a pernicious doctrine."

Ivanhoes and Sons of Gwalia, however, have continued to present a firm appearance, the latter being helped by the further cable to hand during the week as to developments on the new southern ore chute, the importance of which I have mentioned in previous notes. At the No. 9 level this chute has just been struck in a crosscut, and is of good width and value, while at the same level a very satisfactory section of payable ore on the main chute was recently struck. It is believed that the southern chute will be proved to extend from the No. 4 to the No. 13 levels, and the effect will be to give the mine a new lease of life. Even at the higher market price now ruling for the shares, the dividend yield is nearly 16 per cent. per annum, and, having regard to the promising prospects, I shall not be surprised if the price makes further progress in the upward direction.

COPPER GROUP DEPRESSED UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF THE FURTHER FALL IN THE METAL—GREAT COBAR AND MOUNT ELLIOTT RUMOURS—THE RISE IN WEST AFRICANS.

The further fall in the price of copper has exercised a depressing influence upon the market in the shares of companies producing, or formed to produce that metal, both as regards the volume of business passing and the trend of quotations. The drop in the metal to nearly £100 per ton is attributed to easier reports from the United States, where the demand for electrical purposes appears to be on a smaller scale than of late. This, as a prominent firm of metal-brokers have observed, may, of course, be only a passing phase, but otherwise it would seem to foreshadow a shrinkage of the consumptive demand for copper. The price has, however, seen some recovery from the lowest level touched during the week, and share values in the case of the leading speculative counters have rallied in sympathy. How prices have fared on balance the subjoined table shows:—

Last week in dealing with Great Cobars I mentioned the market rumour that the announcement of a dividend would be postponed until the end of the year. This story is now contradicted, and I am told that by the end of next month a distribution will be declared. "Bear" speculators certainly seem to have been doing their utmost to get the price of these shares down, for not only was the dividend postponement rumour circulated widely, but a report has been spread about of the main shaft having caved in. The report, I may add, is not confirmed. At the carry-over on Friday last there were indications of a fair "bear" commitment in respect of these shares, so that it would probably not take much favourable news to cause a sharp recovery—a smart rally in the metal would very likely be sufficient to frighten the short interest into repurchasing. As regards other Australian copper descriptions, Mount Elliotts have been depressed by a rumour that the company intends making a fresh issue of capital. It is, however, pointed out by well informed people that some months ago 40,000 Mount Elliotts were placed on this side at £4 each, and it is calculated that, in all, the company must have some £200,000 cash in hand. The working capital raised by the issue mentioned is apparently being held in reserve for the time when the Government railway reaches the vicinity of the mine, when the company intends to erect a connecting tramway and smelting plant. Meanwhile, it is pointed out, the money being realised by the shipments of rich ore goes a long way towards paying for the development of the mine. I think a recovery in Mount Elliotts may reasonably be looked for, and I also expect Mount Lyells to come in for increased attention again in the early future, in view of the approach of the time for the declaration of another dividend. Elsewhere in this issue will be found a circular issued by the Mining Exploration Company, giving the result of the investigations made by Mr. R. Gilman Brown, who recently joined the Board as technical director. The company, it may be remembered, owns copper properties in Chili, the one on which work has been concentrated being known as the Choicas. It will be seen that Mr. Brown recommends that this property and the Victoria mine be treated as one, and that he calculates by the time the smelter will be operating at its full capacity of 36,000 tons of ore per annum the company will be able to produce matte giving a yearly profit of £110,000 on the basis of copper at £90 per ton.

One of the principal features of the past week's operations in the Mining Markets has been the steady improvement in prices that has occurred in the West African group. Some weeks ago dealers made an attempt to attract more speculative attention to "Jungle" securities but were not successful. The time chosen was anything but propitious, but in commenting upon the fiasco I expressed the opinion that there was ground for the hope that sooner or later business in the shares of this group would expand, intrinsic conditions having improved. It may be remembered that I mentioned the Abosso and Prestea Block A in particular as developing satisfactorily, and I am interested to note that the shares of these two concerns have taken a prominent part in the upward movement during the past week in consequence of the cables to hand from the mines. But, as far as I can ascertain, dealers have not been very successful as yet as regards attracting public support to West Africans. I am told by people in close touch with the market that the rise in prices has been mainly due to professional operations, and unless the public does come along and help to keep the ball rolling it is hardly likely that the improvement will be long maintained.

COTTON ON THE COVER SYSTEM.

A firm named Barclay and Co., styling themselves "cotton brokers and dealers," 11, Spring-gardens, Manchester, and 4, Featherstone Buildings, High Holborn, W.C., are sending out a booklet designed to gammon unsophisticated people into entrusting them with money for gambles in cotton "futures" on the cover system. This is the sort of silly, ungrammatical twaddle with which the subject is introduced:—

DISTRUST unscrupulous dealers who try to substitute inferior inks. Ridicule the excuses "out of stock," or "just as good," and—buy elsewhere. Insist on having STEPHENS' INK.

> But there is a vast difference in speculating in Stock Exchange ventures and in the realities of buying cotton. Although many people regard the Stock Exchange as a necessary evil, yet to millions the Cotton Exchange is an absolute necessity. The Cotton Exchange really means that the industry of millions of people are (sic) focussed within its walls. . . . Why should not we combine in England? Why should we not let our patriotic feeling govern us to keep the cotton industry in our own country? Patriotism would then be awarded (sic) with profit to yourself and others.

Barclay and Co. then proceed to explain their system of speculating "in the realities of buying cotton" in very much the same terms as those that are employed by bucket-shops recommending similar transactions in "Stock Exchange ventures," the principal difference being that the margin "controls" so many bales of cotton instead of so many shares. "There is hardly a day passes," says this booklet, "without it being possible to make a profit." There may be a possibility of profit for some people, but there is a practical certainty of loss for the poor dupes of Barclay and Co.

A Lairage for Lamb-like Shareholders.

I have received a letter from a shareholder in the International Cold Storage and Lairage Company, Ltd. (Southampton Dock), with reference to a circular inviting subscriptions to a 6 per cent. second mortgage debenture stock. He expresses the opinion that his fellow-shareholders will be acting very foolishly if they allow themselves to be again driven like sheep into a lairage where they have already been rather badly shorn. In view of the melancholy history of the concern, this seems to be a sound opinion. The company has done nothing but drop money—and drop it heavily—ever since its inception, and there is not the least likelihood that it can be converted into a commercial success. Judged from the shareholders' standpoint, it is practically as dead as frozen mutton.

The Bucket-Shop Brigade.

While business on the Stock Exchange remains practically at a standstill, the bucket-shops are rather more active than usual. So at least I gather from the stream of circulars that has poured through my letter-box during the past week or two. The Stock Exchange may bemoan the indifference of investors and the shyness of speculators, but the bucket-shop brigade can cheerfully pursue the even tenor of their way, in the sure and certain hope that gulls are always plentiful. Nearly all the circulars are from old acquaintances, though some of them have been hiding their light under a bushel for the past few months. Milne, Son, and Hamilton, 11, Queen Victoria-street, E.C., are among those who have just come out on the warpath once more. They recommend an operation in "Canpacs" on a 1 per cent. margin, but should it prove unremunerative, they "guarantee to refund one-half of the cover." Even with the guarantee—whatever that may be worth—this is a very poor sample of philanthropy in comparison with the magnificent offer of the rival firm of Hamilton, Smith, and Co., 80a, Fenchurch-street. "It is not every day a dividend of 22s. can be picked up on every 10s. invested." Indeed it is not, but Hamilton, Smith and Co., instead of selfishly picking up the money themselves, are ready to transfer it to your pockets. All that you are asked to do is to send them £50 to "command" 100 shares in a gold mining company which has declared a dividend of 22s. per share. "The dividend alone represents a profit of £110." In case, however, this should not be sufficiently tempting the firm "undertake to say within the next three months, on an investment of £50 we should be able to show you a profit (including the dividend) of something like £150 to £200." I have no doubt that if Hamilton, Smith and Co. thought that your credulity would be equal to the strain, they would just as glibly "undertake to say" that the profit would be £150,000 to £200,000.

In its latest effusion the National Share Exchange, 22, Great Winchester-street, disclaims any pretensions to "the gift of prophecy or the art of the necromancer." This seems to be a false modesty, because, according to its own account, this institution is continually making predictions which enable its clients to secure handsome profits by dealing in shares on the cover system. Not only is this so, but, as the Exchange declares that it acts as principals in all these transactions and charges no commission, it must, on its own showing, be losing the thousands of pounds which its fortunate clients are making. It sounds a very unlikely story, but there are apparently any number of simpletons prepared to believe in the existence of such boundless benevolence. Another concern practising upon the innocence of the public in precisely the same manner is The Stock Exchange Investment Corporation, 8, Union-court, Old Broad-street, E.C.

Recently I related the experiences of two misguided ladies, who, between them, had lost £50 in the "stock unions," otherwise "blind pools," run by the London Scottish Stock Exchange, 20, Bucklersbury, E.C. But, unfortunately, exposures in the press produce little or no effect upon businesses of this class, and "A. Murray," of the London Scottish, is still busily engaged in roping in fresh victims by means of the same mendacious statements of the enormous profits that he secures for his clients. So, also, are the London and Counties Exchange, St. Swithin's Chambers, E.C., whose blind pools are called "bi-marginal investments," and the National Securities Corporation, 181, Queen Victoria-street, E.C., which employs the euphemism of "combined stock operations." Laurie and Vincent, 70, Queen-street, E.C., give prominence in their latest circular to one delicious bit of unconscious humour—"We make money with your money." Lots of fools have discovered this after parting with their cash, getting neither the promised profit nor that return of their capital which is "guaranteed" by Laurie and Vincent. The latter are, in fact, conducting their business in such a manner that it is amazing that they have not yet received the attention of the City police.

A Sign of the Times.

Half a column of the Times of Friday was occupied with a puff, from which I take the following:—

> Within the last few weeks there has been an almost overwhelming demand for a remarkable book—a book dealing concisely, but with a masterly completeness with a subject of absorbing interest. . . . It enlightens, informs where hitherto was misconception or perhaps ignorance. . . . To have missed reading its thrilling, fascinating pages is to have missed part of one's education. No one can read the book without benefit, and the possibilities it opens up so incisively and so unmistakably are immeasurable.

No; though it reads like it this was not an advertisement of one of the wonderful bargains of the Times Book Club. The remarkable, absorbing, thrilling, fascinating, masterly work in question is the pamphlet given away by the bucket-shop firm of Arnold and Butler for the purpose of bamboozling greenhorns into a belief that they can obtain a profit of ten, twenty, or thirty per cent. on their money with scarcely any risk if they will only follow the firm's advice on the subject of "marginal investments." Though the great publishing houses no longer send advertisements to Printing House Square, it is a decided shock to find that the Times has now been reduced to the extremity of accepting the patronage of such cover-snatchers as Arnold and Butler.

Notes on New Issues.

The Renard Road and Rail Transport Corporation, Limited, has been formed with a capital of £250,000, divided into an equal number of preferred and ordinary shares of £1 each. Subscriptions are invited for the whole of the preferred shares, which are entitled to a cumulative preferential dividend of 7 per cent. per annum and, in addition, to one-third of the net profits remaining after payment of a similar dividend in any year on the ordinary shares. The company acquires the patent rights for the United Kingdom and other parts of the world for the Renard train and also the business of Ed. Surcouf et Cie, of Billancourt, Paris. The Renard system of road trains, invented by the late Colonel Renard and improved by Messrs. Surcouf, has been in commercial use in France for more than eighteen months; and the orders in hand—which, it is stated, will give a profit more than sufficient to provide the preference dividend for the first year—include three trains for the French War Office. An agreement has been entered into with the Daimler Motor Company for the manufacture of the Renard train for Great Britain and other parts of the world outside France.

Bitulithic Quarrite, Limited, is a company formed with a capital of £300,000 to acquire and develop patents, processes, and works now held by the Northern Quarries Company, Limited, of Grange-over-Sands, England, and Warren Brothers Company, of 93, Federal-street, Boston, America. It is stated that the company will be in a position to meet the requirements of public authorities in connection with dustless road construction, and will also be in a position "to treat any sound macadam and convert it into a dustless road paving by agencies previously unknown and the success of which has already been established." The prospectus, however, contains no figures showing the commercial results of the business which the vendor companies have been carrying on for the past six years.

Under no circumstances can I reply by post, and as there seems to be a misunderstanding in the minds of many of my readers, I wish to emphasise the fact that a coupon must be attached to* every inquiry. A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the coloured cover of Truth.

2. Six different stocks are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks an additional coupon or coupons (one for every half-a-dozen stocks) must be forwarded. The answering of many of the inquiries I receive necessitates a great deal of careful research, and I shall therefore be compelled henceforth to enforce this regulation. Its necessity will be apparent when I state that some correspondents send lists of 20 or 30 different stocks covering every class and description of Investment.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

4. Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

5. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

6. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

7. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

8. I do not recommend brokers or solicitors.

Government Securities

Delta.—1. The bonds are to bearer, therefore there is no question of a transfer. 2. I do not see any attraction.

Railways.

Cardew.—Personally, I doubt if you would be entitled to realise any portion of the holding, but in a matter involving trust money you ought not to act without laying the full facts before a solicitor. Bonds.—1. No. 2. The property is a poor one, and the price reflects the market's doubts about the continuance of interest payments.

Mines.

Minnehaha.—I would not advise you to subscribe any money in connection with the American Exploration Co. T. E. H.—Nos. 1, 3 and 4 are fair speculative holdings. No mining share can be considered a safe investment. Township.—I do not see that you have any claim on your brokers. In the event of a moderate recovery in the price you had better realise with a view to the employment of the money in something more promising. Teduce.—They are speculative, but might be held for some recovery. Colonial advices state that the mine is now opened up to a point admitting of a large output, and though the average value of the ore is rather lower, profits are assured. W. H. T.—The shares are a hopeful speculative holding for dividends, and would be likely to improve in sympathy with a recovery in the price of the metal. Brigg.—The shares are very speculative, and you could make a more attractive selection. County Cavan.—Subscribing more money must be considered a pure speculation, and I think you would do better to employ the amount elsewhere. Reader, Amsterdam.—1-3. The secretary is not to blame. Any one can obtain a list of shareholders by paying for it. As to the exact object of the sender of the circular, I cannot, of course, give a definite reply, but the fact that the shares are being thus puffed does not impress me favourably, and in the circumstances I think you had better take advantage of recovery in the price to realise. 4. I must refer you to Rule 8. Investor.—1. I think you would do better to put the additional money into something else 2. It is impossible to estimate the life of such a property. There is a fair chance of the shares having some recovery later on. Watercress.—Very speculative, and unless you are prepared to face the possibility of a further fall you had better realise. 2. In your circumstances I do not care to advise you to buy more, but they should have some recovery from the present level. 3. I am afraid there is not much hope for this. 4. You do not say what shares you hold, so that I cannot advise as to your chance of getting out without loss; but, generally speaking, an improvement in this market seems probable.

Mixed.

Stuck.—1. Better cut the loss. 2. Hold for some recovery. 3. These bonds are worth holding. 4. Sell on a moderate advance. K. H.—The Chicago Great Western bonds ought to be worth keeping. Both the bank shares are high-class investments, and I see no reason to part with them. Dan.—1. The market price is about 8s. It will be some time before the concern will be in a position to make any distribution, but the shares seem a fair speculative lock-up. 2 and 4. Better leave this form of speculation alone until you have acquired some knowledge of its intricacies. Leonard Higgins, on the "Put and Call" would help you. The price is 3s. 6d., and the publisher Effingham Wilson, 54, Threadneedle-street, E.C. 5. I should prefer to regard the shares as an investment to be paid for outright. 6. Quite good. Zoroaster.—1. I have no means of knowing how the company has been doing for the past twelve months. 2. The shares have fallen because of the gradual exhaustion of the richest ore, but at the present price they seem a very fair speculation, having regard to the latest official statement of ore reserves. Golf.—All four are hopeful commercial investments, but if you do not want so many, give the preference to Nos. 4 and 2. Inquirer, Bridgnorth.—You ought to retain Nos. 2, 3, and 4, which are high-class investments. No. 6 is a small concern, but appears to be doing well enough, and I see no reason to advise a sale. The others are more speculative holdings, and you might do better elsewhere. An exchange into, say, Buenos Ayres Western Railway Four and a Half per Cent. Preference, Grand Trunk Second Preference, and Agricultural Bank of Egypt New Three and a Half per Cent. bonds should be worth making. I cannot answer for the outside institution named; generally speaking, it is advisable to deal with a member of the Stock Exchange. Cradock.—The bonds are not quoted in the London Official List, but I will make inquiries in the market and reply next week. Lambert.—1 and 2. Both are fair purchases. 3. You might take them as a gamble. 4. You are legally liable for the call. Wales.—1. An early dividend does not seem likely, but I think you might keep your shares in hope of some recovery from the present level. 2. Keep them for the present. 3. I see no reason to advise an immediate sale. Lisna.—1 and 2. The only dividend paid by the company was in shares of a subsidiary enterprise, and it will probably be some time yet before it is in a position to make a cash distribution. At the present price, however, the shares are a fair speculation, with a view to locking them away for ultimate appreciation in market value. 3. I would not recommend averaging. Hold on to what you have. Oxon.—1. There is a fair chance of a recovery. 2. Keep Interoceanic Preference. 3 and 4. Also these. 5. I have no special information, but they seem to be very speculative. T. W. W.—1. A sound investment. 2. Keep them. Tyke and others.—Your questions will be answered next week.

Insurance.

G. H. P.—If you will send me specimens of the coupons and any notices in references to the scheme which appeared in the paper, I may be able to give you some useful advice. Verb. Sap.—The conditions of your policy seem to be quite different from those of most life offices, and I propose to comment on the matter in a week or two. Please let me know the exact nature of the policy. Was it a 30-year endowment assurance, effected at age 30? Dingo.—You can quite safely hold the shares. The future prospects of the company are good, and whatever happened the business could be sold to another office at considerable profit to the shareholders. D. W.—The association seems to me to give no guarantee of stability, and I should advise you not to join it. D. W.—1. National Provident Institution. 2. Clergy Mutual, Equitable Society, London Life, Metropolitan. 3. The policy is good, but not so good as can be obtained elsewhere. Subultan.—Write for the prospectus of the Clergy Mutual. If you have no relations, near or distant, who are clergymen, write to me again, and I will recommend another office. Arrow.—You should certainly keep your policy in force. The prospects of the company are much better than they were, and it took quite the right course in declaring no bonus at the last valuation. York.—These shares are a fair speculative investment. The company is vigorously managed, and may or may not be an ultimate success. It could probably at any time sell its business to another company at a profit to the shareholders. F. J. C.—You may feel the most absolute confidence in the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation. Any failure to pay the annuity now, or in the future, is inconceivable, and the terms offered are better than you could obtain anywhere else. You could quite safely buy the whole annuity from this corporation, but the Scottish office you mention is also perfectly safe. Zampa.—Quite reliable for your purpose. A. Preuss.—My note on this company appeared on October 31, 1906. The company did the right thing in declaring no bonus; the future prospects are good, and you should certainly continue the payment of premiums. Rockingham.—The Commercial Union is a perfectly sound and strong company.

MISCELLANEOUS.

M. O. M., Burton, W. H. C., O. R. S., Smyrett, Colonel, Thrift, White Heather, Perplexed, G. M. T., Colchester, Novice, J. W. T., New York, Assistant-Surgeon, Punjab, and other correspondents.—Many warnings have been published in TRUTH against the International Securities Syndicate, Cunliffe, Russell, and Co., Melville, Glyn and Co., and other touting dealers in Continental government and municipal lottery bonds. Their circulars and pamphlets are grossly misleading, and they charge prices for the bonds outrageously in excess of those current on the Continental bourses, where dealings in such securities are recognised. I do not give advice as to the merits of different bonds, or in any way recommend this form of speculation. For the most part the bonds are a sheer gamble, a delusion and a snare to the small investors on whom they are unloaded. However, for the information of correspondents who still wish to buy such bonds, I may mention that they can be obtained through the London branch of the Crédit Lyonnais, or Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle-street, E.C. Finance, J. F. S., and Digamma.—The Charing Cross Bank is not, properly speaking, a bank at all, but a common usury-shop run by a man named Carpenter. Have nothing to do with it either as a depositor or a borrower. C. H. S.—Distinctly speculative. The concern has not yet shown itself a commercial success. Shamrock.—1. A fair speculation. 2. Yes, unless there was a stipulation to the contrary. 3 and 4. Freeborn, Franklin and Co., and Milne, Son and Hamilton, are bucket-shop keepers whom you should avoid; see TRUTH Cautionary List. Nitrate.—I have had no reason to criticise the firm you now mention. Seeing that you are in Chili, however, it would be especially imprudent of you to engage in speculations on "margin." You would be almost certain to drop your money. Justice, J. M., C. H. C., and M. E.—The bucket-shops, whose circulars you forward, have already been noticed in TRUTH, but I will repeat my warnings. F. S.—1. Obviously it would be useless for me to attempt to advise you about this small local society, which is unknown outside its immediate neighbourhood. 2. According to the latest edition of the "Copper Handbook," the company named is a holding company only, "property consisting of two-thirds stock interest in the Dakota-Calumet Company, which is idle." Cleopatra.—Nos. 2, 3, and 4 are fair commercial investments, but I do not recommend the others. 6. It is imprudent to take the advice of such circulars; but as to the firm, see Rule 8. Light.—I know nothing of the company or its directors, and it is impossible to form an opinion upon the leaflet you send. W. F.—I will make inquiries. J. P., Camberwell, and other correspondents.—Thanks for the German lottery circulars, which shall receive another notice in TRUTH. C. G.—It would be useless to sue these swindlers; if you had been a reader of TRUTH you would have seen warnings against them. Gilly.—1. I have not a great opinion of the concern. 2. They are quoted at a small discount. 3. They might possibly improve with other motors. 4. I do not fancy it. Pater.—They seem a hopeless holding. Anxious.—1. I cannot trace the concern. 2 and 3. Very poor opinion of these. Executor.—It is a small concern of which little is known, and I regret my inability to advise you. Firth of Forth.—1. I know of no reason for anticipating an advance. 2. Next meeting is about a year off. 3. Impossible to ascertain. Argent.—No information is available respecting the concern. Why not write the secretary, demanding a report? Cape.—The shares might be held in the hope of an ultimate recovery, I think. The name would seem to signify confidence rather than anything else. Miss N.—1. If you do not want to pay the call, sell the shares, which, by the way, might ultimately improve with others in that market. 2. Hardly likely to recover their recent high price. 3. A poor speculation. J. J. G., Cubitt Town.—A bucket-shop of the worst type; you would certainly lose your money. See my remarks in another column. Chaplain.—I am afraid I cannot help you in the matter, but I should like to retain the correspondence for the present.

SMALL INVESTORS AND THE MISCELLANEOUS MARKET—PEKIN RISE — SEWING COTTON POSITION—"SLUBBERS"—THORNYCROFT'S DECLINING TRADE—MOTOR SHARES WEAK—ALLSOPP'S REVIVAL.

It is said that here and there the Miscellaneous Market is beginning to benefit from an increasing demand on the part of small investors, but the latter will have to show themselves much more freely to produce any perceptible general effect. At present, it must be confessed, the signs of any real improvement are few and far between, and the market as a whole continues in a state of suspended animation. The most curious and noteworthy movement last week was the sudden revival of activity in Pekin Syndicate shares, which had fallen into a more or less moribund condition. Quite a sharp rise occurred, but it is difficult to detect any justification for it in the report of the consulting engineers on the operations of the company in Honan during the past three months, while the talk about the probability of the concession being bought up by the Chinese Government does not appear to have any foundation. To my mind, at least, Pekins and Shansis remain a very unattractive speculation. Hudson Bays have been rather weaker, exhibiting a slight loss, and the same story has to be told of Anglo-American Telegraph Deferred. At the extraordinary meeting of the English Sewing Cotton Company the chairman declared that the directors were not aware of anything to warrant the recent rise of the shares to 42s., which he bluntly attributed to the market being "rigged." There is no suggestion that the company is doing badly—on the contrary, there is every reason to expect that the results for the current year will be satisfactory enough, but the chairman emphasised the fact that the policy of the board must be "to make substantial appropriations from revenue for reserves," and to place the undertaking in a position which will allow of "a reasonable and steady return" being made on the ordinary shares. In view of some of the alarming statements that had been published, the chairman's speech was not considered unfavourable, and the ordinary shares of the company have been fairly firm at 34s. The only other event of interest in this section has been the publication of the report of the British Cotton and Wool Dyers' Association, Limited. A year ago, for the first time since its formation in 1900, this over-capitalised concern paid a dividend of 2½ per cent. on the ordinary shares, but that startling new departure has promptly been abandoned, no distribution being made this time. However, nobody had been sanguine enough to count upon another dividend from "Slubbers," and the shares remained unchanged at 5s., which is assuredly quite as much as they are worth.

A decline in the ordinary and preference issues of John and J. Thornycroft and Co. followed the appearance of the report, which was even more unsatisfactory than that for 1905. In the past twelve months there was a heavy falling off in trading profits, and the preference dividend has to be passed. It is hoped that the completion of the arrangement for the transfer of the whole of the shipbuilding work from Chiswick to Southampton will result in considerable economies, but at the best the outlook for the ordinary shareholders of the company, who have received no dividend now for two years in succession, is far from promising. Motor shares have developed an unaccountable weakness, and Argylls, Darracqs, and Daimlers are all somewhat cheaper. All these appear to be good purchases at the present prices. An interim dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum has been announced by the Argyll directors, being the same as that paid for the corresponding period a year ago. Dunlops were adversely affected by some criticisms of the company which have been widely circulated, but the directors' reply was deemed entirely satisfactory, and the shares have fully recovered the ground that had been lost. In catering descriptions no movements worth mentioning have been witnessed. The British Tea Table Company's report has disclosed the fact that it cannot now pay either the preference or the ordinary dividend, but the shareholders seem to have received the announcement with comparative equanimity—at any rate, the shares suffered only a small and momentary relapse. Judging, however, from the directors' statement, some scheme for the reorganisation of the capital of the company seems to be desirable, and possibly one will be submitted at the meeting this week. Among Brewery securities Allsopps again stood out conspicuously by reason of another advance in both the ordinary and the preference. Better results seem to be confidently expected from the recent changes in the management, and the reported decision of the directors to follow the example of other brewery companies by supplying their tied houses with wines, spirits, and tobacco as well as beer. By the way, some of the comparatively small brewery companies achieve results which must excite the envy of the shareholders in

QUEER STORY.

SOLD BY AUCTION.

SCENE: The billiard room of a well-known country house in the Midlands. Time: The hour of 1.15 a.m.

The last pool was just finished, and the men who had taken part in it were having a final gossip, before retiring to rest, with all that free and easy abandon, alike of subject and of phrase, which usually obtains in the billiard-room when the ladies have gone to bed and the whiskies and sodas are circulating freely.

Of those two eternal topics of conversation to which, when men are alone together, the talk always sooner or later comes round, viz., women and sport, it was the former that was now on the tapis. I do not mean that they were discussing the sex generally. At that hour of the night their brains were not in condition for any problem so complex and abstruse. But they were gossiping about one particular woman, Miss Maud Wallington, the belle of the house-party, a girl of the most up-to-date type, and as inveterate a gambler as ever sat down to a bridge table.

It was Teddy Bishopsford, a youthful subaltern of Grenadiers, who first introduced the lady's name.

"My eye!" he said. "Did you see how badly Miss Wallington got hit to-night? I was quite sorry for her. I'm told she lost six ponies."

"Only on paper, though," murmured Algie Carstairs, with a meaning grin. "I myself would lose ten times the sum, without turning a hair, if I could discharge the obligation as easily as she does—with a lead pencil and half a sheet of note."

"But I suppose she takes up her I.O.U.s sooner or later," replied young Bishopsford, simply.

At that ingenuous observation a ripple of cynical laughter ran round the room. It was evident that the idea of Miss Wallington redeeming her I.O.U.s in cash, as a matter of course, struck the assembled company as rather a rich joke.

"What are you fellows laughing at? What have I said ridiculous?" inquired Teddy Bishopsford, flushing.

"My dear boy," said Viscount Beddington (who sat next him), a hard-bitten man of the world, and one of the senior members of the party, "if you had as much experience as I and some others among us have of the fair Maud's paper, you would have no occasion to ask such a question, I can assure you."

"Do—do you mean she doesn't pay up?" ejaculated Teddy Bishopsford, looking quite aghast.

"I mean," replied his lordship, coolly, "that, at this moment, for my sins, I hold the lady's paper to the face value of more than three hundred pounds, for which I'd willingly take a tenner down and think I'd done a sound deal."

Teddy Bishopsford looked much distressed. Like most young men, and a good many older ones for that matter, he was more than a little in love with Maud Wallington's pretty face and winning ways; and this ruthless shattering of his beautiful idol really hurt him.

"But if it is as you say," he protested, evidently eager to find reasons for not accepting the popular verdict, "how comes it that Miss Wallington is received in society, is asked to all the best houses, and that people are still willing to play cards with her? Surely, if she were a known defaulter, she would be barred by everybody."

Again a ripple of laughter at Teddy Bishopsford's exceeding ingenuousness ran round the room.

"My dear chap," said Algie Carstairs, "even if we were not aware of the fact independently, your remarks would make it quite evident that you have not long left Sandhurst. By the time you have become rather more of a man of the world——"

"A man of the world?" interjected young Bishopsford, indignantly. "But I always thought that anything like dishonesty over card debts was one of the few things that even men of the world regard as unpardonable."

"Quite so—in a man," nodded Carstairs.

"But not in a woman?" demanded Bishopsford.

"It depends on the woman," answered Algie, in his lazy drawl. "If she is old and ugly, strict honesty is required of her. But if she is young and pretty—especially as pretty as the fair Maud—well, men are generally a good deal less exacting, don't you know."

There was such a world of meaning in Algie's tone above and beyond what his mere words conveyed, that Teddy Bishopsford was provoked into demanding, quite fiercely:—

"What the devil do you mean, Carstairs?"

Algie threw up his white, feminine hands, in a gesture of mock helplessness.

"Oh, take this dear child on and enlighten him, some of you," he murmured, appealingly. "He's beyond me. I'm not used to such innocence."

Teddy Bishopsford flushed angrily, and half rose from his seat, as if he contemplated going for Algie Carstairs. But Viscount Beddington laid a firm yet kindly hand on the lad's arm, and drew him back.

"All right. You mustn't mind Algie's chaff," he said. "He can't help rotting, you know. It's the nature of the beggar. And, after all, what he says, or implies, is perfectly true, in the main. There are hundreds of men who are not only willing, but positively eager, to take the fair Maud's worthless paper in discharge of her bridge debts, and so lay her under an obligation to themselves."

"But why should they wish to lay her under an obligation?" demanded young Bishopsford, scowling quite ferociously at his mentor.

"Because," replied Beddington, "when a girl owes you a lot of money that she can't pay, it naturally makes her awfully nice and sweet to you, don't you know. And it's no bad thing to have Maud Wallington awfully nice and sweet to you, as you may easily imagine."

"I don't believe that Miss Wallington is the sort of girl who'd behave in that way to any man, unless she cared for him," cried out young Bishopsford, indignantly.

Again a ripple of laughter ran round the room. Teddy Bishopsford, now very angry indeed, stood up and faced the assembled company.

"I tell you what it is, you men," he exclaimed, with flashing eyes and hot burning cheeks, "if you can see anything to laugh at in my defending a lady's character against these vile aspersions cast upon her behind her back—well, I'm sorry for you, that's all."

And he flung himself wrathfully from the room.

As the door banged behind his retreating form, Algie Carstairs, unobserved by the rest of the company, winked almost imperceptibly at Viscount Beddington.

But there was one member of the party who, though he had taken no part in the foregoing conversation, had listened to every word of it with intense interest. This was a stout, vulgar, consequential-looking person named Klopstein, a cosmopolitan financier of great wealth but doubtful antecedents, who had recently blossomed into a Society man. Nobody knew much about him beyond the fact that he was immensely rich; which was all, indeed, that anybody cared to know. He kept an ostentatious bachelor establishment in Mayfair, where he gave frequent and extravagant entertainments during the season; and he rented, besides, a large place in Scotland, with grouse moors and a deer forest attached, where he played host also en garçon to his sporting friends. But it was a matter of knowledge that he had a wife hidden away somewhere in the country—a timid, inoffensive person whom he had cruelly ill-used while she lived with him, and who had been willing enough to consent to an informal separation on the terms of a moderate annual allowance.

However, Society had nothing to do with Klopstein's personal character or domestic arrangements. If he had behaved like a brute to his wife—if he was known to be destitute of morals and devoid, I will not say of every gentlemanly, but even of every decent, feeling—well, that was no business of theirs. As long as he was willing to lay out his money to Society's advantage, so long was Society perfectly willing to swallow him. He was an unusually big pill, but the pill was unusually well gilded.

The reason why Klopstein had listened with such interest to the discussion of Maud Wallington and her I.O.U.s was, as you might have expected of him, entirely the reverse of creditable. In his own coarse, animal way Klopstein was what may be euphemistically termed in love with Miss Wallington. He had made certain overtures to her, which had been coldly repulsed. For the fair Maud, if not more scrupulous than other hard-up Society girls in encouraging moneyed admirers, was still too fastidious to entertain, for one moment, the familiar attentions of such an odious beast as Klopstein. The girl's coldness had not only enraged him, it had also inflamed him the more. Consequently, he was burning to get some hold over her, by which he might compel her to climb down from her high horse and submit to his unwelcome addresses. And while he listened to the foregoing conversation, it had crossed his mind that if he could only succeed in laying hands on a sufficient quantity of the lady's paper, he should have an irresistible engine for applying the screw.

Presently he rose from his chair, and, strolling carelessly across to Lord Beddington, deposited himself in the seat just vacated by Teddy Bishopsford.

"That young fool seems to be rather far gone on the fair Maud," he remarked, with a leer.

"Yes, he's evidently badly hit," answered Beddington. "Not much good, though, I fancy. Teddy's fairly well off and not badly connected, of course. But the damsel's 'out' for bigger game than Teddy—you bet."

"It would seem so, from the airs she gives herself," said Klopstein. "In my opinion, she wants taking down a peg or two."

"I'm rather of your opinion," assented his lordship. "Perhaps you've noticed how she treats me when I try to make myself nice to her. Damme, it's all very well, you know. But that's not quite the way to treat a man who holds her paper to the tune of several hundred pounds, is it?"

"I should rather think not," snarled Klopstein. "You're too easy with her, my lord. Why don't you put the screw on and bring Miss Stuck-up to her bearings? I know I would, if I were in your place."

"I don't like to," replied Lord Beddington. "It's rather a difficult matter, you see, for a man to make himself nasty to a girl about money, though I admit she quite deserves it, and I shouldn't be sorry to see some one else take on the job."

Klopstein's eyes glowed. This was the very opening for which he had been spelling. He jumped on to it at once.

"Look'ee here, my lord," he said, "you remarked just now that you'd be willing to sell the lady's paper cheap to any one who offered you cash down. I think you named a tenner as the figure—eh?"

His lordship nodded.

"Well, I'll give you five tenners for the I.O.U.s," said Klopstein, pulling out the note-case which he always carried in his pocket.

Lord Beddington hesitated for a moment; and while he hesitated, Algie Carstairs, who was sitting near, and had been listening with pricked ears to all that passed, suddenly struck in.

"Eh? Going to do a deal over the fair Maud's paper, Bed?" he inquired, with a lazy smile.

"Mr. Klopstein has just made me a sporting offer of £50 for the stuff," answered his lordship; "and I was thinking of closing with it."

"Fifty pounds! Oh, you can do better for yourself than that, Bed," answered Algie, with a confidence for which Klopstein hated him on the spot. "Lay you six to one that Teddy, the chivalrous, would give you at least double the money."

Klopstein scowled. He could cheerfully have throttled Algie Carstairs at that moment. What the devil did the jackanapes want cutting in like this for and spoiling business?

"I guess my pocket has a deeper bottom to it than young Bishopsford's, my lord," he interposed, significantly.

"Damme," cried Algie Carstairs, clapping his hands suddenly; "I've just struck ile in the shape of a really brilliant idea. What rippin' fun it would be, and what a rise we should get out of young Teddy, by collecting all the lady's paper we can lay hands on and putting it up to auction here to-morrow night. Eh? What? Isn't that a bright idea, now? Hanged if I won't be the auctioneer."

"What's that, Algie?" inquired another member of the group, attracted by Carstairs' tone and manner.

"I was saying," replied Algie, turning to face the company, "what prime fun it would be to have an auction of all the fair Maud's I.O.U.s here to-morrow night—at eleven for twelve o'clock, as they say in the profession. Eh? What?"

"There wouldn't be very spirited bidding, I'm afraid," remarked somebody.

"Oh, I don't know," rejoined Algie. "Here's Mr. Klopstein itching to pick up some of Maud's paper; and unless I'm much mistaken, Teddy, the enamoured, will bid against him out of pure chivalry. There may be others, too, who, for reasons of their own, would like to get the whip hand of the fair damsel; and altogether I anticipate prime fun. So any of you men who want to have the chance of a lifetime in realising on your bits of paper—let me have 'em in time to put into the sale to-morrow night."

Algie's humorous, if not very manly, still less gentlemanly, proposal was greeted with roars of approval, in which Klopstein alone did not join. Indeed, the financier was furiously angry with the facetious young aristocrat who had thus put a spoke in his wheel; and he strongly suspected that it had been done on purpose, in order that holders of Miss Wallington's I.O.U.s might thereby be enabled to extort a better price for their paper. However, after all, he reflected, a few hundreds, more or less, didn't really matter to him. There wasn't a man in the party whom he couldn't bid to a standstill, and he made up his mind that, even if he had to give the full face value, he would take care that every scrap of Maud Wallington's paper that might be put up should be knocked down to himself. Indeed, on further reflection, he was by no means sure that this new turn of events didn't really tell in favour of his nefarious plans, after all, for the more of her paper he got into his hands, the stronger engine would he have for putting on the screw. He felt quite serene and happy, therefore, in the prospects of the auction on the morrow night. . . .

It was shortly before midnight next evening when the irrepressible Algie Carstairs, with a smile anticipative of coming enjoyment on his face and an ebony ruler in his hand, mounted the raised daïs at the end of the billiard-room.

"Ladies and Gentlemen—I mean gentlemen," he began, flourishing the ruler in his right hand, while in his left he held up a bundle of papers neatly tied together with blue ribbon; "allow me to call your attention to this exceedingly choice and valuable lot which I am now about to offer for sale, and which affords a unique opportunity to capitalists and others for a profitable investment. I hold here, gentlemen, a bundle of I.O.U.s, twenty in number, bearing the signature of Miss Maud Wallington, for varying amounts from £8 to £105, and making up a grand total——"

"Good heavens! What the devil does this mean, you cad?" cried Teddy Bishopsford, starting angrily forward.

"Order there! Don't interrupt the sale," said Algie, with mock sternness, as he blandished his ruler.

"Shut up, Teddy," whispered Lord Beddington, plucking him by the sleeve, "some of us poor devils who've been hard hit ourselves are obliged to realise on the paper we hold; that's all. And we've decided that an auction's our best chance of getting a decent price. Now do have some consideration for us and hold your tongue."

"Consideration for you?" ejaculated Teddy, turning upon him in hot indignation, "none of you deserve any consideration. It's the lady whose I.O.U.s you are hawking in this blackguardly way for whom I feel——"

"Needs must when the devil drives," interposed

Beddington, shrugging his shoulders. "How can we pay our card debts if we don't get paid ourselves? Besides, you can do no good by protesting. If you care to do Miss Wallington a service by buying up her paper yourself and making her a present of it, of course, that's quite another matter," he added, significantly.

"By G—d, and so I will!" cried the chivalrous Teddy, his eyes flashing scornful indignation on the assembled company.

"Now, then, when you two gentlemen have quite done," remonstrated Algie Carstairs, from the daïs, "I'll proceed with the sale. We have here, gentlemen, as I was saying, twenty of Miss Wallington's I.O.U.s, ranging in face values from £8 to £85, and making up a grand total of £1,100. Now, then, what offers? Don't all speak at once."

"Fifty pounds," bid Klopstein.

"Hundred," bid Teddy Bishopsford.

"Hundred and twenty-five," bid some one else.

"Hundred and fifty," bid Teddy.

"Hundred and seventy-five," bid Klopstein.

"Two hundred," bid Teddy.

Here followed several bids from other members of the company at a £10 rise per bid, carrying it to £250. Then Klopstein took up the running again.

"Two seventy-five," he bid.

"Three hundred," bid Teddy, defiantly.

By this time every one else had retired from the contest. It had evidently resolved itself into a duel between Klopstein and young Bishopsford.

"Four hundred!" roared Klopstein.

"Five hundred!" shouted Teddy.

"Six hundred" (from Klopstein).

"Seven hundred" (from Teddy).

So they went on, openly defying each other. But Klopstein meant to have the lot, and his longer purse won. Teddy was finally bowled out at £1,400, the outside limit of his immediate cash assets, and the I.O.U.s were knocked down to Klopstein for £1,450. He was very angry at having to pay so much money—actually £350 in excess of the face value of the paper—and he cursed young Bishopsford roundly, under his breath, for having run him up to such an extravagant figure. Still he felt triumphant, too; for he had gained his point. And, after all, £1,450 was a mere flea-bite to a man whose bank-balance was never inside five figures.

But his thoughts were interrupted by the drawling voice of Algie Carstairs, who with a practical promptitude hardly to be expected in so lack-a-daisical a young man, was reminding the purchaser that the terms of the sale were cash or cheque down.

"All right. I'm not a wrong 'un," answered Klopstein, rather irritably, as he produced his cheque-book with an ostentatious flourish from his pocket. "Here, let me have a pen, and I'll settle the business at once."

"Thanks awfully," drawled Algie. "And, I say, make it open, dear man. For I shall have to cash it to-morrow and distribute it among the various vendors of the I.O.U.s."

"As you like. Don't matter a brass button to me," rejoined Klopstein, in his swaggering way, as he wrote out an open cheque for £1,450, and tossed it over to Algie with a lordly air.

Algie took the cheque, examined it to see that it was in order, and then handed Klopstein the bundle of I.O.U.s.

In the meanwhile Teddy Bishopsford, nearly mad with rage and generous shame, had rushed off to his bedroom. Why had Klopstein been so keen on getting hold of those I.O.U.s? What use did he mean to make of them? In view of the fellow's known evil character, the nature of his object seemed only too apparent. Teddy hardly got a wink of sleep that night, but lay awake tossing distractedly on his bed, and wondering what he could best do to be of assistance to the woman whom he loved with all the fresh ardour of his boyish heart. At length, he resolved to seek the first possible opportunity of speaking to her next morning, of warning her that Klopstein had bought up all her I.O.U.s, and offering her all the available cash he had to help extricate her from the brute's evil clutches.

But next morning he sought in vain for his opportunity of getting a word with Maud Wallington. She did not put in an appearance at breakfast (nothing very unusual in that), nor, though he "drew" every likely spot in the course of the morning, could he catch so much as a glimpse of her. While thus looking out for her, he several times came across Klopstein prowling around as though in search of somebody, and who that somebody was the indignant Teddy had no difficulty in guessing. This, perhaps, it dawned upon him, was the explanation of Miss Wallington's keeping out of the way. Probably she had heard of last night's events, and was purposely avoiding her persecutor.

Luncheon time came, and still no Maud. Teddy appeared at the table looking very white and miserable. Klopstein's manner was glum and sulky. He drank copiously of champagne—more, in fact, than was good for him. After luncheon he drew Lord Beddington aside and requested a word with him.

"I say," he inquired, "What's happened to Miss Stuck-up? What's she lying low like this for—eh?"

"Ah! I wonder?" replied Lord Beddington, coolly. There was something so significant—so mocking in his lordship's tone, as he uttered the words, that Klopstein's attention was immediately arrested by it.

"Damnation!" he ejaculated, savagely. "You don't mean to tell me that the gal's bolted?"

"I don't know that I meant to tell you anything," replied his lordship, coolly. "But since you put the question to me directly, my answer is, 'Yes, she has.' She left with Algie Carstairs at eight o'clock this morning, when he went up to London to cash your cheque. They were to be married at ten o'clock, and by this time, I should say, are half-way across the Channel."

Klopstein's face was a study of pretty well all the evil passions to which human nature is liable.

"Ten thousand devils!" roared Klopstein, "this is some infernal conspiracy——"

"Well, you may call it a conspiracy if you like," interposed Lord Beddington, calmly. "At any rate, it is a friendly arrangement whereby an effective spoke has been put in your vicious designs, and poor stony-broke Algie has been provided with the necessary funds for his elopement—out of your pocket."

ART NOTES.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

Second Notice.

QUITE the best time to pay a visit to the R.A. is about four p.m. on the Saturday after its opening. You are not able to see any of the pictures; but that, after all, is a small matter. You are able to see the people who are looking at them, and thus to understand how widespread is the love of art in this country. If you are interested in silk hats, you may, as it were, survey the whole history of the trade for at least the last ten years. It is really wonderful how beautifully many of them have been preserved. I suppose the truth is that they are kept in lavender all the rest of the year, and are only taken out for the one great annual artistic event. They are frequently worn in conjunction with a yellow-spotted purple tie, and occasionally with brown boots; they are almost invariably accompanied by a young or middle-aged lady, and they are universally surrounded by an atmosphere of solemn respectability—as of those who sacrifice to an uncertainly tempered god. But all this is a digression, and not at all what I am trying to write about. So it is to point out that Saturday afternoon is a bad day to study the R.A. detectives. Not because they are not in evidence. They are—very much so—threading their way through the assembled crowds with an artistic aloofness which could not be bettered, keeping one, ostensible, eye upon the works of art, and another, business, eye, upon the possible fingers of possible pick-pockets in a manner which would have delighted the heart of M. Vidocq. Nevertheless, Saturday is a bad day on which to study them, for the simple reason that the crowd is too thick to allow of your seeing their boots. Failing that, it is almost impossible to distinguish between them and the less preoccupied art-lovers among whom they mingle. Year after year, as May comes round, these worthy officers gird themselves for their task; year after year they perambulate the galleries, from I. to XI., cast keen glances through the statuary, occasionally sidle abstractedly into the lonely Black and White room, or the Architectural Room, disturbing young lovers who have chosen those halls of solitude for the exchange of their tremulous confidences. Year by year—but what I want to know about them is, what do those lynx-eyed sleuths—such I understand is their technical description—what do they think of the pictures? Do they ever look at them, I wonder? Do they, in the intervals of their official interchange of views upon the advisability of keeping an eye upon the suspicious young person in mauve silk and a black picture hat or the bluff British farmer with the side whiskers and rosy cheeks—do they ever discuss the supremacy of Sargent, lament the decadence of the Academical tradition? After all, there is no reason why their opinions should be valueless. We know—for the ha'penny papers tell us so, year by year—that policemen and postmen and publican's assistants are included among the exhibitors at the R.A.; why should not a detective be competent to pronounce upon their work? It seems to me that the Daily Mail would be exactly the paper to obtain their views and to give them to the world, and I have much pleasure in presenting the idea to Lord Northcliffe and the more enterprising of his young men.

Quite apart from any question of artistic merit, those same respectable officers would certainly be exceptionally well fitted to dogmatise upon the most popular pictures of the year. Where are the popular pictures there are the crowds gathered together, and there, in the execution of their duty, are also the detectives. I admit that, at the time of my visit on Saturday afternoon the crowds were so thick that it was difficult to tell where they were thickest. But there were slight differences. Thus, in the first gallery it was easy to see that Mr. Leader still maintains his old position as the most generally popular of English landscape painters. There is a large "Evening"—it is a very characteristic Leader, indeed, and it contains water and a large tree. There was a very dense ring of admirers around it on Saturday, and the air was full of little sighs of admiration. Close to where I was standing there were a young man, in a silk hat, and his young lady. The young lady was very much interested, more so, I think, than was her squire. "What is it, Herbert?" she insisted, with careful aspiration. The young man, peering through a chink in the crowd, must have caught a glimpse of the tree. He turned to the catalogue and considered. "It's a Leader!" he said at last, with an air of awed conviction. "A Leader—oh!" echoed his companion, in similar tones. And, perfectly content, they left the outskirts of the worshipping throng and turned to where another band of enthusiasts surrounded Mr. Sargent's portrait of Lady Eden. These were, if possible, more solemnly enraptured, though a shade of perplexity mingled with their pæans. I found the key to it in the whispered inquiry addressed by an elderly lady, with black jet ornaments, to the eye-glassed daughter, who was acting as her cicerone. "Do you think she has really got a throat like that? It seems quite—quite unnatural, somehow." To which the superior daughter replied: "How can you be so stupid, mamma? Don't you know it's a Sargent?" There was another rather less reverent crowd before Mr. Arthur Friedenson's landscape, "Runswick Bay," drawn to it, I suppose, because of its purchase for the Chantrey Bequest. I heard one connoisseur declare that it looked as if it were painted with cobwebs; but whether he intended a compliment or the reverse I cannot say. Mr. Orchardson's fine portrait of Mr. Heaton-Armstrong, M.P., was another popular picture, to which some one referred in my hearing as, "Looks healthy, doesn't he?" and Sir Edward Poynter's competently dainty little "Lesbia and her Sparrow" shared Mr. Sargent's "Lady Eden" crowd, the two pictures hanging close together.

In the second gallery, as far as I could make out, the most popular paintings were Mr. F. G. Swaish's "Convalescent," a pretty little painting of a little girl, some fairies, and a very nice Indian quilt; Mr. Stanhope Forbes's "At their Moorings," some of his beloved fishing boats resting in the gloaming; Sir Edward Poynter's "Fishing," to which I referred last week; Mr. Edward Stott's "Cottage Madonna," which explains itself; Mr. Briton Riviere's "Portrait of an Elderly Gentleman," the said elderly gentleman being a Scotch terrier of reverend aspect; Mr. Denis Eden's "Peire of Valeria," a quaintly-shaped very pre-Raphaelite painting of a lazy jongleur idling under a hedge. No doubt one of the detectives will correct me if I am wrong in thinking these the most popular paintings in the room; I am quite sure they ought to be.

I might go through the whole exhibition in this way, singling out the best-thronged pictures of the year: Mr. Cope's portrait of the King's Coronation Robes; Mr. Sargent's "Lady Sassoon"; Mr. Alfred East's "Old Durham," a fine landscape, this; Mr. Cadogan Cowper's "Devil Disguised as a Troubadour"; Mr. Campbell Taylor's "Rehearsal," certainly one of the finest pictures shown, though, as it happens to have been bought for the Chantrey Bequest, I suppose quite a number of earnest critics will be unable to appreciate it; and so on and so forth. But I am not going to, because plenty of other people will have pointed them out already, and there are some other points about the show which I find much more interesting. For instance, why are there such a number of Indian portraits exhibited this year? They are dotted about everywhere—swarthy, moustached Highnesses, Nawabs, Rajahs, Dewans, and Maharajahs, busts, full-lengths, and statues—it is as though the most aristocratic section of the National Congress was holding a rather lifeless sitting at Burlington House. There are Indian ladies also—"Mrs. Ratan Tata," for instance, by Mr. J. S. Shannon—and children, a Chinese child at least, and a very fascinating one, standing at the knee of His Excellency Sheng Hsuan-huai (Sheng Kung-pao), painted by Miss Mary E. Leveson, in a very fine pelisse of sables, which I should think his Excellency's wife must regard with envious eyes. Why have these illustrious potentates all taken it into their heads to have their "photos took" at the same time, and exhibited in the same exhibition? Or is it a sign that portraiture is following in that same path of evolution as is landscape, and that just as the really advanced landscape-painter scorns to paint a blue sky, devoting his whole energies to winter and snow-scenes, so it will soon be held that, artistically speaking, a pink and white complexion is a concession to the "pretty-pretty," and that we must either have our faces painted with brown skins, or be considered out of the movement? I see I have forgotten to mention another dusky portrait, not that of a Highness this time, but of a regular little duck, in other words, "A Little Malay Girl—Singapore," painted, and very well painted, by Miss Gertrude Nutt. It is a peculiar feature of this little brown girl that she looks quite happy and at ease. It may be that in this fact lies the explanation of the new fashion of going outside Caucasia in search of sitters. I do not know enough about the habitual expression of high-class Hindustan to feel sure whether the resigned expression of the above-mentioned pictured and sculptured Rajahs, Dewans, and Nawabs, is that of extreme melancholy or of aristocratic toleration, but I am ready to swear that of all the many hundreds of pale-face portraits there are not more than half-a-dozen which look even remotely happy or at ease. In the case of many of the men there is some excuse for this, for quite a number of them are represented in fishing or golfing or shooting costume—I suppose it is a result of the "open-air" movement—and that a man should look at his ease when having his portrait painted in rough tweeds is perhaps too much to expect. But I do not think that all the sitters—male and female—can really look so miserably self-conscious; I think it must be, in a few cases at any rate, the fault of the artist, and I only hope that none, or very, very few, of these same portraits are intended to be hung in ancestral picture-galleries, side by side with pictured ancestors as immortalised by the great painters of the past. If they are, the number of Old Masters who will turn in their graves will be enough to produce a very fair imitation of an earthquake. I should like to point to one exception to this general air of malaise. It is the portrait of Sir Andrew Noble, by Mr. Harris Brown, and it shows the distinguished scientist as quite at his ease. So far as I can understand the picture, he has just stabbed some unseen enemy with a deadly weapon, which may be either a spear or test-tube. The enemy has evidently fallen dead under the table, and the look of horrid exultation—if I may say so without impoliteness—upon the stern features of the victor, is really marvellously rendered.

There are a lot of other pictures I should like to write about if I could remember them. Instead, I will refer to two pieces of statuary, both of them, to my mind, of the first rank. The one is Mr. Alfred Gilbert's "Mors Janua Vitæ." I cannot pretend to altogether realise its meaning. It shows the bust of a man and a woman, supporting and gazing down upon a casket, on the lid of which are two small allegorical figures which I take to represent "Sleep and his brother Death." The two heads are beautiful in themselves, and in their expression. Still more beautiful is the manner in which they support and complete each other, in the set of their hands upon each other's shoulders, protecting love in their every line. It is a group which inspires thoughts that are worth thinking, and it would render the exhibition worth the visiting were every other room boarded up. The other one is a nude statue of a dancing child—"The Elf's Music," by Mr. Anders Olson—and the amount of life and action in the quaint little limbs and body are so vivid as to be almost startling, come upon suddenly in that cold mausoleum of prim, lifeless marble which they call the Lecture Room.

MUSIC.

WHERE ARE OUR GREAT COMPOSERS?

THERE is hope for musical England after all.

What I have maintained, do maintain, and always shall maintain, is that the English can compare very favourably with any other nation as regards musical taste and culture. Indeed, our country is second to none in this respect. Hitherto nearly all the greatest composers have happened to be born in Germany. That time, however, has now passed, and at the present moment the greatest living composers (I need not mention names) are Englishmen, though unfortunately only the most enlightened of their contemporaries seem to be aware of this fact.

Thus Algernon Ashton, the one and only. The testimony is certainly reassuring. Let Strauss, Reger, Debussy, and the rest hang their diminished heads. The Continent may make much of them and their like, but greater than these are to be found in what Mr. Joseph Holbrooke calls this lovely old isle of Great Britain. But what a pity that Mr. Ashton withholds so tantalisingly the names of these great ones. Here is surely a case for those "fuller and further particulars" beloved of lawyers. One of our immortals Mr. Ashton could not be expected to name, of course, for very modesty. But he need not be so reticent concerning the others. Seriously, what is the true test of a composer's greatness? Perhaps none better could be suggested offhand than his standing in relation to the musicians of other nations. The verdict of the foreigner, it has often been said, anticipates that of posterity, and this for the obvious reason that it is one delivered without fear or favour, and even in the teeth of adverse prepossessions. The latter circumstance may not conduce, it is true, to leniency of judgment. But at least it secures against too great a readiness to approve. At the same time, the anti-patriotic bias is less likely to operate to any undue extent in music than in any other art, since music is a universal language which makes its appeal with equal force to all. A German or a Frenchman might be forgiven for failing to penetrate the Eleusinian mysteries of Browning's poetry, or for lacking appreciation of Mr. Kipling's highly specialised prose. But there is no earthly reason why either one or the other should have difficulty in enjoying an Englishman's symphony, or a Scotchman's concerto.

Applying this test, then, can it honestly be said that Mr. Ashton's bold claim is borne out by the facts? It would be extremely pleasant to think so, but candour compels a negative conclusion. There is no disguising the fact that with very few exceptions, which merely emphasise the rule, English music is virtually unknown on the Continent. Here and there at rare intervals a daring German manager mounts an English opera in Germany. Now and again an instrumental work from a British pen is given in Paris or Berlin. But, speaking generally, it is a melancholy fact that British music is utterly ignored on the other side of the Channel. Is it possible seriously to maintain that there is no significance in this, or to put it down to nothing but vulgar Chauvinistic influences, which refuse to recognise genius where it exists? He would be a bold man who ventured to uphold so desperate a theory. We may be perfectly sure, as a matter of fact, that if any English composer had produced, let us say, the "Pathetic" symphony, it would have had just as much success throughout the musical nations of Europe as that of Tchaikowsky has enjoyed. The unfortunate part of it is that none of our native musicians has yet seen his way to give the world a work of this arresting character. Nor can it be, as one would be glad to think, the depth or difficulty of our native music which stands in the way of its acceptance. A Continental public which revels in Strauss and delights in Debussy is not likely to be deterred by the difficulties of such mild and blameless pages as our leading composers are accustomed to put forth.

But the case does not end here, for what is more painfully significant even than the determined neglect of our British composers by the musicians of the Continent is the fact that they enjoy hardly any greater favour among ourselves. It is an old, old story, of course, this scant appreciation of British music by British audiences, but it is idle to ignore the meaning of such a state of things, and from the standpoint of the impartial observer possessed with the single aim of looking facts squarely in the face, there is only one possible conclusion to be drawn from it. That conclusion may not be very flattering to our national pride, or particularly pleasing to the many erudite and estimable musicians among us whose works are so sedulously eschewed by their fellow-countrymen, but it would be the idlest self-deception to attempt to ignore it. Mr. Ashton hints darkly at the purblindness of the public which hinders them from appreciating the greatness of the unnamed geniuses to whom he alludes, but how many can seriously accept this as a true explanation of the matter? Was there ever a time when real genius had a better chance of obtaining recognition than at present? Was there ever a time when a sharper lookout was kept for the smallest suggestion of authentic talent? Are there not Palmer Funds for the young and provincial festivals for the mature? And do we not vie with one another in acclaiming the least considerable production which affords the smallest warrant for such a course? Why, therefore, put forward this fantastic notion of a dark conspiracy to ignore and overlook that which so many are eager to discover? What conceivable reason is there why British music-lovers should be less ready to welcome the work of a native composer than to do honour to and find delight in that which comes to us from foreign parts? Such notions are, in truth, childish to the last degree, and only calculated to induce amusement on the part of the outsider. Let Mr. Ashton try again, therefore, and find another and more reasonable explanation of a condition of affairs which, however much it may be regretted, is unfortunately not to be got rid of by the simple process of asserting that it does not exist.

At Covent Garden lately the "Ring" has been engaging chief attention, but by the time these lines appear the second cycle will have been concluded, and it remains now only to congratulate those responsible on the success which has attended the performances. The production of the "Ring" is a tremendous undertaking, and it is vastly to the credit of all concerned that the thing has been done so well. Finer singing has, perhaps, been heard on some former occasions, but from the point of view of all-round efficiency and smoothness of ensemble, and in particular in the excellence of the stage management, the recent performances have seldom, if ever, been bettered. The singers were mostly the same as those of the first series, but there were one or two new comers, notably Herr Van Rooy, who sang as powerfully and acted as impressively as ever in his old part of Wotan. A new Siegmund was forthcoming, also, in Herr Cornelius, a Danish tenor new to Covent Garden, who made quite a favourable impression. This evening (Wednesday) lighter fare begins with "La Bohème," with Melba and Caruso, which is to be followed by "Madama Butterfly" on Friday.

It is thirty years this month since Dr. Richter, who is once again doing wonders at Covent Garden, first came among us, and the fact suggests reflection on the inestimable value of the services which he has rendered to music in this country throughout that long period. In the history of music in England during the past half century two names will always stand out pre-eminent, namely, those of Joachim and Richter, and it would be hard to say by whose labours we have benefited most. Enough that both, if their musical ideals have not been absolutely identical, have always been conspicuous for their championship of the best and noblest that the art has to offer, and that each has happily had his reward, not only in material recompense, but in the unlimited esteem and admiration of the musical public. The occasion of Dr. Richter's first visit to England was, of course, the famous series of Wagner concerts at the Albert Hall in 1877, when he shared the duties of conductor with Wagner himself, and of all the many eminent musicians who have helped in the Wagnerian cause since, none certainly has done more than he, to whom Wagner himself once referred as "the impossible-achieving, much-tried, for-ever-answering Hans Richter." Long may he stay with us.

Strauss's "Salomé" seems to have caught on surprisingly in Paris. There are the usual exclamations of astonishment, of course, over the amazing and unprecedented character of the music, but, at the same time, a note of genuine admiration seems to pervade most of the criticisms which have appeared. In Paris, at least, "Salomé" was safe against a repetition of the experiences which befell it in New York. Parisian audiences are used to strong fare. Meanwhile, it has been left for Saint-Saëns to provide the most picturesque description which has been so far forthcoming of the Straussian orchestra:—

> This orchestra quivers, sings, yelps, howls, breaks out, thunders, calms down, works itself into a passion, coughs, sneezes. . . . At one moment it sounds like the slish-slash noise of silk being torn; at another like the smashing of a pane of glass. Or it is the wind howling, or wood creaking; then it resembles a peacefully flowing stream, which finally hastens its course, falling over a precipice with a noise like thunder. The greatest freedom reigns; while one group of instruments is wandering about in one key, another, without hesitation, moves about in a neighbouring key, while the voices go off in another direction. Often sweet, rapturous passages, which succeed cruelly lacerating sounds, enchant the ear; and while I listened to all this, I thought of the beautiful aristocratic maidens of a Sacher-Masoch, who, while bestowing voluptuous kisses on the young men, are raking their ribs with red-hot iron; or of Mirbeau's "Garden of Tortures."

"Paris has ratified the verdict," says one correspondent, "that 'Salomé' is the greatest music drama since Wagner." When are we to have a chance of making acquaintance with Strauss's music in London? A stage presentation would offer difficulty, of course, on account of the Biblical text. But this would not apply to a concert performance.

Concerts lately have been more numerous than important. M. de Pachmann took leave of his admirers in characteristic style last week, and has seldom been in better form, either as pianist or farceur. He will certainly be missed while away. Another piano recital of some interest was that of Miss Myrtle Elvyn, a pupil of Godowsky, who not only plays with fine technique, but is obviously a musician as well. Lionel Ovenden, who has been heard again, is a prodigy who goes one better than some of his rivals by playing on both piano and fiddle, and also composing; but if he cultivated his talents in private for some time longer yet he would probably benefit in the long run. Another youthful violinist who has been appearing again is Joska Szigeti, whose talent is indisputable. In the London Choral Society's performance of "Samson et Dalila" on Saturday afternoon, Mme. Kirkby Lunn and Mr. John Coates took the principal parts, and a good all-round performance of the work was secured. On Monday M. Safonoff conducted the London Symphony Orchestra again, introducing for the first time a symphonic poem, "The Sunken Bell," by Metzl, and securing also a fine performance of Tchaikowsky's fourth symphony.

In connection with the coming Orlando Gibbons commemoration, Sir Frederick Bridge makes the apt suggestion that the celebration in the Abbey on June 5 should be supplemented by the performance of the old master's music in cathedrals and churches on the following Sunday. "The whole of the music we do at the service," Sir Frederick writes, "will shortly be published by Bosworth and Co., edited by myself, and the book will be found to contain a very varied selection. The various anthems, etc., will be published separately at a cheap rate, and this will, I hope, enable churches to add something of Orlando Gibbons to their stock of music. I should be glad if the idea of a general commemoration could be carried out." It will be interesting to note to what extent the suggestion is adopted. We are all ready to hymn the praises of our dead and gone worthies, but as to actually performing their music, that is the last thing which occurs to most. After all, centenaries and such-like celebrations too often serve mainly to show up our cheerful neglect of those honoured at other times.

Dr. Ludwig Wüllner, the well-known singer, has been appearing in Berlin in the unwonted capacity of violinist, and apparently with success. Without any pretensions to being a virtuoso, he has, we are told, a technique fully equal to the demands of Brahms's violin sonatas, while his playing is characterised by the same glowing temperament and the same high order of musical and artistic intelligence as his singing. Wüllner is, of course, not by any means the only vocalist who plays the violin as well, though, so far as public appearances go, the others have usually been confined to young ladies delighting in this way to exhibit on the stage or in the concert-room the diversity of their talents. As a singer Wüllner took part, it may be remembered, some years ago in the first London performance of "The Dream of Gerontius" at the Westminster Cathedral, on which occasion, however, his success was only moderate.

From a daily paper's list of Sunday services:—

> ST. THOMAS, Regent Street. 11, Rev. T. H. Passmore; 12, Lunch in F; 6.30, Rev. P. T. Bainbrigge.

"Lunch in F" at twelve is excellent. Is it that waggish printer again?

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—I have never read in tale or history a more thrilling story than that Mr. George Macaulay Trevelyan tells in his "Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Republic" (1) of the hero's retreat with his four thousand through countries swarming with implacable enemies. Xenophon's Retreat of the Ten Thousand was a march past by comparison.

> All the hunters were out to catch the lion. In Tuscany and the Papal States alone there were some 30,000 French, 12,000 Neapolitans, 6,000 Spaniards, 15,000 Austrians, and 2,000 Tuscans, who had no enemy to contend with, and no other operation on hand but the chase of Garibaldi.

Even he could not have anticipated all that lay before him when he called for volunteers to accompany him upon the terms, "I offer neither pay, nor quarters, nor provisions. I offer hunger, thirst, forced marches, battles, and deaths." But the personal magnetism of the man was sufficient to enlist four thousand volunteers on these terms.

I had no idea of enlisting (said a young Italian artist to the Rev. H. R. Haweis); I was a young artist, and went only out of curiosity—but ah! I shall never forget that day when I saw him in the market-place, with his noble aspect, his calm, kind face, his high smooth forehead, his light hair and beard. He reminded me of nothing so much as of our Saviour's head in the galleries. I could not resist him. I left my studio. I went after him. Thousands did likewise. He had only to show himself, and we all worshipped him. We could not help it.

And eleven years later this artist recruit was still fighting by his side. A poor cobbler, who had sheltered Garibaldi during that desperate retreat, was at the point of death when years later the hero passed in triumph through his village. The sick man had even received extreme unction when he was roused by the shouts of the triumphal procession. Hearing it was Garibaldi who was passing, he tried to quit his bed to join the acclaiming crowd. Garibaldi, upon being informed of his devotion, hastened to see him, and his visit had the effect of bringing the man back to life! It must be admitted that Garibaldi sometimes abused the fanatic loyalty of his troops. Here is Emilio Dandolo's account of an enterprise, quixotic to craziness, on which Garibaldi despatched him.

"Go," said Garibaldi to me, "with twenty of your bravest men and take Villa Corsini at the point of the bayonet." Involuntarily I remained transfixed with astonishment—with twenty men to hurry forward to attack a position which two of our companies and the whole of Garibaldi's Legion, after unheard-of exertions, had failed to carry."

These devoted men, having run the gauntlet of the French fire with the loss of eight of their number, reached the villa—garrisoned by several hundreds of the French—which they, twelve strong, were expected to take with the bayonet! It is surprising that even six wounded men survived the insane enterprise. On the other hand, Garibaldi was as careful of the lives of his enemies as he was reckless of those of his men.

He constantly spared disguised military spies who, by the laws of war, had fairly forfeited their lives; while it was his special care to save the lives of his enemies in battle, and for the vanquished foe he was all tenderness and respect.

Again, his humanity to animals—far from a pre-eminent Italian characteristic—was exemplary.

The tenderest of the brave, he took thought not only for men and women, but for the joys and sufferings of animals; ever since the day when, as a child, he had cried over the wounded grasshopper, he was brother to every living thing. He could not endure that a bird should be caged, nor allow an animal to be struck in his presence. During his Dictatorship of Naples in 1860 he spent, in trying to remedy the condition of cab-horses, time which others thought should have been given to tasks of government; and in the following year, when he was the most famous man in Europe, he thought it natural to go out at night in the rain to seek a strayed lamb among the rocks and brushwood of Caprera.

The only fault to be found with this fascinating book, which was obviously a labour of love to Mr. Trevelyan, is that it gives you no glimpse of Garibaldi "as the most famous man in Europe." You feel the novel reader's thirst for the third volume, after you have come to the close—which is the close of the book—of Mr. Trevelyan's spirited account of Garibaldi's thrilling escapes. Of these I shall give you two average specimens. On one occasion, while Garibaldi and his companion were lying beside a clump of bushes, a section of the Austrian troops scouring the country for him passed on the other side. On another occasion, waking from a doze in an inn, he found beside him Austrian soldiers who at that moment were informing the hostess that "they had just come up 3,000 strong to catch the infamous Garipalda." Signing to the hostess to keep them in conversation, Garibaldi drew a cigar from his pocket, lit it at the lantern (which he so replaced on the table that its light left his face in shadow), and this he smoked tranquilly till the soldiers quitted the inn. But, indeed, no boys' book was ever fuller of heroic incident and of hairbreadth adventure and escape than this historic narrative, which is written in a style worthy at once of the subject and of the famous relative from whom Mr. Trevelyan derives his Christian name.

I was amused to see in a leading London journal that Mr. Bradley-Birt, in his "The Romance of an Eastern Capital" (2), threw a new and interesting light upon the life of the author of "Vanity Fair," who, it seems, "went out to India as a writer in the Company's service when he was seventeen and returned to England with his bride when he was twenty-six." Of course, the William Makepeace Thackeray mentioned by Mr. Bradley-Birt was the grandfather of the author of "Vanity Fair." "The Romance of an Eastern Capital" is extremely interesting, but as depressing as it is interesting. Here is a characteristic story from its blood-stained records. A prince having slain his father in battle ordered the eyes of all his stepbrothers to be torn out and presented on a salver to their mother! Yet this was the exemplary king of whom also the following tale is told: A widow complained to a judge that the king—whom she had not recognised—had accidentally wounded her only son with an arrow. The judge summoned the king before him and condemned him to compensate the widow for the accident to her son, which the king did royally. Then the judge prostrated himself at the king's feet, fearing his vengeance, whereupon the king showed him a sword he carried beneath his cloak and said: "Judge, in obedience to your commands as expounder of the Sacred Law, I obeyed your summons. If I had found that you had deviated one jot from its ordinances, with this sword I should have decapitated you." "King," replied the judge, laying his hand on the scourge which hung in the court, "I also swear by Almighty God that if you had not complied with the injunctions of the law, this scourge should have been laid upon your back as upon that of any other criminal." Fortunate is the young English hero of "Princess Maritza" (3) in winning the love of two such warrior women as the Princess and Countess Frina: but then the Britisher also is so stalwart a warrior that he can spit his adversary through a dead body, held up as a shield, transfixing both as two pieces of cat's-meat are transfixed on a single skewer. The Princess herself rather confirms my misgiving that if women had a vote we should rush more recklessly into war than we do even at present; but she is a charming as well as a Spartan heroine, and is besides the centre of such breathless adventures as keep your interest highly strung throughout. I get rather tired of the priggish, pragmatical, positive detective of fiction; nor does Mr. Robert Chambers's "The Tracer of Lost Persons" (4) help to reconcile me to their owlish omniscience. Indeed, to say the whole truth, such preposterous stories as that of the Pygmalion-like fascination of the creator of the "Gibson Girl"—I beg pardon, the "Carden Girl"—with the type of beauty he had drawn, rather exasperate than interest me. The tracer of lost persons finds his ideal for the artist in the person of a young lady doctor, who is persuaded to be interested in him as the subject of a unique disease and to marry him the day after her first interview with him as her patient. It is quite possible, however, that those who enjoy detective stories may like this burlesque of them.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

The Terrible Teuton once more! Mr. John Long announces yet another story, "The Way of War," which is based on the idea of a German plot for the sudden and secret invasion of England. The author, however, shows more consideration for our nerves than some of his predecessors in the same kind of fiction. Instead of allowing the Germans to succeed, he shows how their secret designs are discovered and frustrated, through the adroitness and courage of the hero, and "the climax is reached in a naval battle, when the steel-clad might of England, being at length let loose, swoops down in all its tremendous power and sweeps the foe from our waters."

In the "Short Cruises" which he takes in the new collection of Mr. W. W. Jacobs' stories bearing that title, the reader renews his acquaintance with some old favourites, conspicuous among them being the night watchman, with his inimitable yarns of Ginger Dick and other sailormen, and the oldest inhabitant of Claybury, with his entertaining narratives of the ingenious Bob Pretty's tricks upon his fellow yokels. Mr. Jacobs' humour is as irresistible as ever in these tales. The book, which is published by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett, price 3s. 6d., has a number of illustrations by Mr. Will Owen, who is always happy in his delineations of Mr. Jacobs' quaint characters.

The new series of biographies which Mr. John Lane is publishing under the title of "Stars of the Stage" makes a happy beginning with a volume on "Ellen Terry" by Mr. Christopher St. John. He is lavish of praise in his sketch of her career, art, and personality, but who will dare to complain on that score? No living actress holds so high a place in the love and admiration of English playgoers, and no one could have been chosen so fittingly as the first of these "Stars of the Stage." The volume, price 2s. 6d. net, has some interesting illustrations. In the same series, of which Mr. J. T. Grein is editor, biographies of Mr. Tree, Sir Charles Wyndham, Mr. Pinero, Mr. W. S. Gilbert, and other actors and dramatists, are promised.

In the introduction to his book on "The Naples Riviera" (Methuen and Co., price 6s.) Mr. Herbert M. Vaughan modestly speaks of it as a medley of history and imagination, of biography and of private comment. A medley, perhaps, but a very entertaining one—the outcome of a thorough knowledge of the history and associations, and a warm appreciation of the beauty of the places he describes, combined with literary skill in conveying his information and his impressions in a light and agreeable manner. The book has twenty-five illustrations in colours by Mr. Maurice Greiffenhagen.

In a novel, entitled "The Passing of Night" (John Long, price 6s.), Mr. J. Fovargue Bradley, a Congregational Minister, tackles the question of ritualism in the Church of England and the desirability of disestablishment—though not disendowment—in the interests of religious and social life. Apart, however, from the purpose running through it, "The Passing of Night" has considerable merit and interest as a story.

An elaborate and copiously illustrated treatise on trout fishing from the pen of Mr. Earl Hodgson is announced by Messrs. A. and C. Black. Believing that no stream can be injured by fair fishing of any kind, the author not only exhaustively deals with fly-fishing, both wet and dry, but expounds such methods as angling with the minnow, the worm, the creeper, the gentle, and the wasp-grub.

"Printers' Pie," the annual edited by Mr. W. Hugh Spottiswoode, is this year a richer dish than ever, full of good things by well-known writers and well-known artists. This annual makes a double appeal to the public. Not only is it in itself a capital shillingsworth, but its sale helps a most deserving charity, the profits being given to the Printers' Pension, Almshouse and Orphan Asylum Corporation.

Mr. Justin McCarthy contributes an article on "The Birth of the Provincial Daily Newspaper in England" to the new edition of Mr. Sell's annual, "The World's Press." It was at Liverpool that the first provincial daily paper was established, and it was as a member of its reporting staff that Mr. McCarthy commenced his distinguished career as a journalist. "The World's Press" contains other interesting contributions, and the usual carefully prepared lists and other particulars of British, Colonial, and foreign newspapers.

Sir Henry Drummond Wolff's career at home as a politician—a member of the Fourth Party and the originator of the Primrose League—and abroad as a diplomatist should provide him with a rich and varied store of reminiscences for the book which he is writing. The work will occupy two volumes and will be published by Messrs. Macmillan.

Mr. Aaron Watson has written a history of the Savage Club to which Mark Twain—a frequent guest of the Savages—contributes a chapter. The book will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. During the present week Mr. Unwin is issuing a volume on "Siena and Her Artists," by Mr. Frederick H. A. Seymour, author of "Saunterings in Spain." In the first part of his new book Mr. Seymour deals with Siena at the present day, her monuments and palaces, her churches and galleries, and her topography in general. The second part is a study of the Sienese School of Art from Duccio to Sodoma.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—I am sure you must remember my describing the evening fête given last summer by the Legion of Frontiersmen. It is to be repeated on Empire Day under the patronage of the Duke of Connaught, and in the same place, the Botanic Gardens, Regent's Park, under the direction of the Earl of Lonsdale, President of the League, and Sir Henry Seton-Karr, Chairman of the Executive Council. The list of patrons has immensely grown since last year. It now includes the Colonial Premiers and Agents-General for the Colonies, and a great number of Generals. The programme for Friday evening (24th inst.) includes a presentment in costume of the duel in all ages, which ought to be very interesting. It will be under the direction of Captain Alfred Hutton and Captain Graham Hope, and a number of other well-known swordsmen will take part in it. The Japanese School of Ju-jitsu (please do not sound the last "u") is to give a display, and new songs will be sung round the bivouac and camp fire, probably the most picturesque portion of the whole proceedings. There is also to be a dramatic and musical entertainment.

John Fourstars, most insular of young Britons, has just come back from six months in Paris, clamouring to be shown "round, rosy, bouncing girls." His French godmother has introduced him to any number of pale, bewitching Parisiennes, "who all looked as if they wanted purple pills or crimson capsules or something," and, so stubborn was his indifference to their charms, that I believe he will marry the next girl he meets with a hockey-stick. He was with his people last week-end when we were there, and his conversation was all Union Jack, except when a French friend was in the room. He brought this young Antoine over to show him "what a jolly kind of girl ought to look like." The Fourstars are motor-mad, you know. They come down to breakfast half-swathed, and are out all day, getting back to nine o'clock supper, for which we were all too tired to dress. On the last evening, when talk had persistently run on motor-clothing, Antoine suddenly burst out in his remarkable English with: "Pouf! It is that I dislike this man, this what you say—this firm, this Gamage! Of how much use to come from Paris to see my little John's English girls? On their heads they wear caps with fe-laps (flaps) to hide their hair—from Gamage; round them to protect their face is chiffon and talc—from Gamage. The eyes are behind glasses—from this same what-you-call. Their divine figures, so straight, they, too, are clothed in do-not-be-afraid-of-anythings from Gamage. I see not the English women—I see for ever the armour of Gamage."

"Well," said Mrs. Fourstars, "if we did not wear that sort of thing we should not be worth seeing. Our

'do-not-be-afraid-of-anythings' are really dreadnoughts (a more convenient name, my dear Antoine). What complexion I have left is due to my talc mask that clips to my hat. The flaps of my cap have banished neuralgia, and the chiffon head-dress keeps every atom of dust out, even when I turn the veil back. I have a lovely fleecy under-coat, over which I can wear any unlined tweed thing. It is much nicer than a detachable lining. Or I can wear my tweed without it, the one with the hood that draws quite close round the face; and you know well, Antoine, that in the middle of a hail-storm ten miles from home you said I had the expression I wear when I am sitting in my drawing-room. You also said that the hood that caused the expression was 'a delectable suiting.' Do not libel our clothes. They are pretty. What of the pale green check silk waterproof that you said ought to be made into a ball-dress? And Joan's white and pale blue tweed, with her pale blue crêpe-de-chine headdress let in with lace? And our loose extra wraps that slip on over everything, so easily that no man need leave his cigar to help us?"

"It is all true! I have wrong. It is not Gamage but the motor which I must have a duel with. I will embrace him and say, 'For me also make a do-not-be-dreaded-of-nought.' Where is he?"

"He is about a hundred yards of Holborn—rather a large armful for an embrace. You had better take John with you to see you through."

Yesterday the Fourstars drove up, Mrs. Fourstars wearing a most delightful and coquettish silk wrap over her well-cut undercoat, and Joan looking almost garden-partyish in white alpaca and close-drawn pink crêpe-de-chine. And on the front seat sat Antoine, cap, flap, talc, and do-not-be-afraid-of-anything, all complete, and a gleaming Gallic smile irradiating the whole costume.

"Now it is that I understand the English sport," he announced. "Never before have I really loved it, but now I, too, embrace motor-riding, and to the weather I say, Pouf!" We laughed at his conversion. It is not very difficult to love a pleasant occupation when you are guarded against all its unpleasantnesses and evil consequences, and withal have a handsome face and figure not obscured!

This is to be a quite tremendous year for motoring. In fact, all Britain is to be one cloud of dust, and to arm ourselves with motor clothing is simply a duty, as well as a pleasure.

Every self-respecting woman is now buying herself new frocks. It is the proper thing to do when all nature is donning her brightest and best; her "clearest of crystal and purest of green." The question always is, whether to buy material and have it made up, or buy something ready-made. If the querist happens to be "stock-size" (there are three stock sizes, I believe), she will probaby decide on the latter. If she should be so fortunate as to have a clever "little" dressmaker (the adjective "little" means "cheap" in this connection), she buys the stuff and possesses her soul as best she can until the "little" person finds time to make it up. Being both cheap and clever, she is naturally in request.

Another plan is to compromise, and buy the skirt ready made, interrogating one's Innerste as to the character of the bodice.

Nearly all the manufacturers of tweeds or textile fabrics have now a department for making-up coats and skirts, and some of these are astonishingly low in price. This is borne in upon me by a box of patterns just received from Copland and Lye, of Sauchiehall-street, Glasgow, whose Scotch homespuns, Caledonian winceys, and "Clachan" tweeds have such a reputation. They have a costume department, and one has simply to choose a material from among their numerous patterns and send off an order, receiving duly a well-cut skirt for a guinea, if tweed, or two guineas if in clan tartan. Their shirtings make delightful tennis suits, or merely skirts to be worn with a blouse. For this, too, their winceys are capital, especially the pure white, and so inexpensive. They begin at 1s. the yard. Bee is having a coat and skirt of one of these, and Maud has ordered a "Highland skirt" (which does not mean a kilt!) in our own beloved clan tartan. Send for a catalogue and box of patterns, and follow their excellent example.

As a man remarked to me many years ago (I remember telling you about it), "the vissitudes (sic) of life is awful." I am often reminded of him, and was so for the hundredth time the other day, when I saw a gown of the Royal Stuart tartan on a poor, dilapidated woman who, with a jug in her hand, was evidently making for the nearest public-house. The gown had once been fresh, and probably had once been worn by a dame of high degree. Even in its decay it showed signs of having been cut with skill, and some glossy black braid of the fashionable sort testified to erstwhile smartness. Richard, who was with me, laughed at this current of ideas, part of which I framed in words, and said it was a lucky thing that ladies' old gowns did descend in the social scale, to be of use to poor women who could not afford to buy new ones.

The Loughborough Hospital ball at the Wharnecliffe Rooms on Wednesday was a great success. They do things so well at the Great Central, and then Mrs. Cunliffe-Owen had taken any amount of trouble to organise it, with her usual result. There were plenty of dancing men, and, as to the music, it was Mr. Alfred de Rothschild's private band, so you can imagine how perfect it was. Everybody was happy, even before supper, and, of course, after it, for it was excellent, and the champagne well iced. How is it that scarcely any one else can manage to give a really good hot supper with champagne for a guinea ticket and yet hand over a substantial sum to the charity?

Among the pretty frocks was a white chiffon trimmed with graduated bands of silver; a gold tissue embroidered with gold and trimmed round the shoulders with shaded pansies; a pale blue taffetas very simply made, but beautifully cut and trimmed with violets; a soft blue chiffon very full and bordered with a band of blue silk to match; a lace in creamiest cream colour embroidered in pale gold and worn over gold tissue, and a black lace over white, which was inimitably worn. There was one successful Empire gown. It looked in near the end of the evening. Some other soi-disant Empire frocks were failures, chiefly because there was an insufficiency of material in them. Josephine, Empress, knew how to combine an apparent skimpiness with a graceful flow of folds, à la grecque. It was from Greece that the Empire fashions originally came.

It is a long time since I told you anything about men's dress, an important topic that should not be neglected. Why, for instance, should you be left in ignorance of the fact that morning coats have but a single button? That the white evening waistcoat has three? The shirt two studs? I am sure that you will feel more worthy of your country and your class now that you have imbibed this information.

At the opera a few men carry about a gold or silver-headed stick. This seems to me an idiotic fashion. What do they propose to do with their sticks? They carefully carry them in foyer and from stall to box when they call upon their friends. As you know, the pretty women like to have the front of their box surrounded by admirers. Sometimes these are so thick about it that they look like a hedge or fence painted black picked out with white. The men outside glare enviously at the "callers" who are inside, and the favoured insides resent the turning on them of a lovely shoulder as its owner converses with the outsides. So runs the world away. Beauty disperses her favours and her snubs, while envy and jealousy rankle under the starch of a two-studded shirt.

Apropos! There is one man (not Bernard Shaw) who frequents the opera and wears a soft-fronted shirt. I hate starch, but could almost love it when I see that man, so dispiriting is his appearance.

Jim, who is always perfectly dressed, turned up at the ball in a dark purple coat, the latest whisper in evening garb. I liked it. The colour was so insidiously subtle that only when his broad shoulder was between me and the light could I detect that the cloth was not black. I hope this new fashion may prove the thin end of the wedge, and that men will soon wear, in the evening at least, some of the brilliant colours that once they revelled in—pontiff purple, cramoisie, violet, puce, deep green, and so on, with ruffles and jabots of old lace. I said so to Jim, who promptly called upon his aunt, as men are wont to do nowadays when anything surprises them, or when they have no sensible remark at hand. In a pause of the conversation at a dinner-table one hears the ejaculation, "Oh, my immortal aunt!" and wonders for the fiftieth time how on earth it originated.

When you tire—one often does—of the ordinary breakfast food, try this marble veal:—

Boil, skin, and cut a dried tongue into slices, then beat it well with half a pound of butter and a teaspoonful of pounded mace, until it is of a smooth paste. Have ready some well-stewed veal, and beat it in the same manner. Season it with pepper, salt, and a dust of cayenne. Put a layer of veal, a layer of tongue, and another of veal into potting pots, fill them very closely, press the meat down very hard, and screen it well with clarified butter. Be sure to keep it in a dry place. When required, cut it into slices. Garnish it with parsley.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

"Mr. Zangwill's new volume forms a fitting pendant to his 'Ghetto Tragedies,' and in that bald statement we desire to pay fitting tribute to his genius. Once more he shows the same invincible pride of race coupled with the same merciless scorn of the anti-Semitic Semite. Alike in matter and manner this is a book of singular and engrossing interest."—Spectator.

BERTRAM MITFORD'S NEW NOVEL

THE WHITE HAND AND THE BLACK

By BERTRAM MITFORD
Author of "The Gun Runner," &c. 6s.

THE STANDARD (first review) says: "Nobody can write stories of South African adventure with quite the same spirit and vigour that Mr. Bertram Mitford exhibits. This tale of the Natal Rising is tremendously absorbing and realistic. The men are put in with fine bold touches, and the heroine's sweetness and charm lend a fragrance of their own to the whole narrative. It is the best story that Mr. Mitford has written."

THE MOST DISCUSSED NOVEL OF THE DAY

THE YOKE

By HUBERT WALES
Author of "Mr and Mrs. Villiers." 4th Edition. 6s.

TATLER.—"What I said about 'Mr. and Mrs. Villiers' some months ago I repeat about 'The Yoke.' But the latter is more than a 'Notable Book,' it is one of striking skill both in plot and characterisation, and assures Mr. Hubert Wales the front rank place among contemporary novelists for which he has made so bold a bid. There is no inane idealism about 'The Yoke,' its intense human interest will be the key to its success."

If you are interested in books you should ask to see some of Messrs. METHUEN'S new books at your booksellers' and libraries. All lovers of Dante should ask for DANTE AND HIS ITALY, by Canon Ragg. A delightful biography, by George Paston, of LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU has just been published. It contains a large number of hitherto-unpublished letters, and is a vivid picture of the life of this remarkable woman. SirOliverLodge's catechism, THE SUBSTANCE OF FAITH, 6th edition, 2s. net, continues to be the book of the day.

The life of that interesting and pathetic personality, FALKLAND, has just been published by Messrs. Methuen. The author is J. A. R. Marriott.

DAYS IN CORNWALL, by C. Lewis Hind, is a new volume in Messrs. METHUEN'S series of topographical books. It has coloured illustrations by W. Pascoe. The whole country is charmingly described. Another new volume in the same series is ROUND ABOUT WILTSHIRE, by A. G. Bradley, with coloured illustrations by T. C. Gotch. Wiltshire is the most interesting county in England.

Mr. Maurice Baring knows Russia as well as any living man, and he has just written a book called A YEAR IN RUSSIA. This should be read both by those who are interested in political problems and by those who are attracted by a delightful style.

Please ask for Messrs. METHUEN'S Novels at your libraries, and especially for ODD LENGTHS and THE COUNTESS OF MAYBURY, by W. B. Maxwell, author of that famous book VIVIEN. THE LONG ROAD is a new novel by John Oxenham, and MERRY GARDEN is the new book by "Q." Please put all these down on your library list.

Messrs. METHUEN have been publishing Sixpenny Novels for many years, and their novels still remain the best and have a constant sale. They include an edition of the novels of ALEXANDRE DUMAS, which in time will form a complete series. Kindly write for a prospectus.

Inebriety can be Cured.

We guarantee that anyone who has a desire to free himself of these awful curses can do so by taking the Keeley Treatment, and will leave the Institute without the slightest crave or desire for either Alcohol or Drugs.

How often must people be told that drink, after it has reached a certain stage, is a disease, which the poor victim again and again endeavours to throw off, while his friends say: "Use your will power and knock it off!" As well say the same of any other disease; in any case, the disease must be eradicated by scientific treatment.

The Keeley Treatment is always administered by regularly qualified physicians, who have made a special study of Inebriety. After carefully inquiring into the history of each patient, and making a thorough physical examination, they treat each case according to the condition of the patient. No matter how long-standing the addiction, or how much has been taken, the result is invariably the same, a cure.

No constitution is too delicate for the Keeley Treatment, as the remedies are perfectly harmless.

Patients are given the utmost freedom; there is absolutely no confinement, and, until the remedies render it unnecessary, they are allowed their usual amount of alcohol or drugs.

"It really Cures."

"It really cures. It does what it professes to do." Such is the emphatic testimony of Mr. Eardley-Wilmot, the well-known secretary of the Church of England Temperance Society, who for some years has had the Keeley method under close observation in this country. He tells how case after case that had been considered hopeless has yielded speedily to the Keeley Cure, the patients returning to their work full of vigour, and happy in the restoration of all that makes life worth living.

Think! either for yourself or others:

will you allow them or yourself to be utterly destroyed when an absolute cure is at hand?

We can show you hundreds of letters of gratitude from patients who have taken the treatment, and who are willing that their names should be given, or they will correspond direct with prospective patients.

Write us to-day and we will prove to you that this cure is an incontrovertible fact, approved by some of our most eminent men, among them the following: Rev. Canon Fleming, B.D.; the Right Hon. Lord Montagu of Beaulieu; H. W. Forster, Esq., M.P.; Vice-Admiral Woodward, C.B.; Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A.; W. Hind-Smith, Esq.; and Eardley-Wilmot, Esq., R.N., Secretary of the Church of England Temperance Society.

More than half a million

have taken the treatment, among them 17,000 physicians. Does not this fact alone speak volumes? And twenty per cent. of our patients come through the recommendation of their family physician.

About one-third of the patients are ladies, all of whom have apartments outside the Institute, of their own selection.

Private Treatment.

At the constant demand of Patients wishing to be treated privately, we have decided to establish a Physician at a watering-place on the South Coast, where they can be treated without the knowledge of their friends or strangers.

The treatment takes four weeks for alcohol (for drugs five to six weeks), and is carried out in the United Kingdom only at the Keeley Institute, 9, West Bolton Gardens, London, S.W.

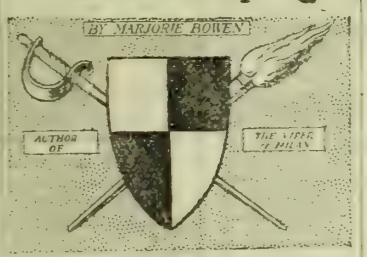
A NOVEL THAT 10,000 PEOPLE ARE READING.

"THE Glen o' Weeping," Marjorie Bowen's new book, was published last week, and attracted, as was only to be expected, the widest interest. After such a success as "The Viper of Milan" it is only natural that Miss Bowen's second book should be subjected to the severest criticism, but from this ordeal "The Glen o' Weeping" has emerged practically scatheless. Almost without exception the reviewers confirm our opinion that it shows an advance on the earlier book—a novel, it will be recollected, that was admittedly the most conspicuous success of the year. Such a performance is almost without a parallel. Witness the "Daily Telegraph," which says: "Miss Marjorie Bowen, whose first book, 'The Viper of Milan,' ran into almost as many editions as its author has years, is likely to repeat her success in her new tale. Evidently, without any doubt whatever, she has a brilliant and lucrative future before her, for she has a rare talent for the telling of romance."

A Second Impression of Marjorie Bowen's new Novel is now ready.

The Glen o' Weeping



"A great improvement on 'The Viper of Milan.'" —OUTLOOK.

"Maintains the standard which gained approval for 'The Viper of Milan.'" —SCOTSMAN.

"It shows in nearly all respects a marked advance." —TRIBUNE.

"We may prophesy for it an equal success." —LIVERPOOL POST.

Here is the secret of Miss Bowen's appeal. "The literary workmanship, the vivid passages which retain the admiration of the reader" (1) "the fine qualities of imagination and taste" (2) "the exceptional power of individualising and revivifying historical figures" (3) each and all have contributed to Miss Bowen's success, but above all is the talent for the telling of romance. The "Morning Leader," in different words, emphasises the same point. "The story is the thing in this full-blooded, generous, and admirably wrought novel." Space forbids the quotation from many other reviews, but enough has been said to show that "The Glen o' Weeping" is a novel of very exceptional power, and to justify our recommendation that it should be ordered at once.

HOW HAIR TROUBLES CAN BE CURED.

Interesting evidence from a gentleman who had suffered from Falling Hair for ten years, but who eventually discovered the correct mode of treating such cases.

Many people are somewhat sceptical as to the efficacy of the means at their disposal for curing the various troubles and disorders that affect the hair: Baldness, Greyness, Irritation of the Scalp, and the like.

They are sceptical because they have tried—or because they have known people who have tried—hair restorative after alleged restorative without avail.

But for all that hair trouble can be cured in nearly every case if the right methods are adopted.

The haphazard application of specific preparations to the hair must necessarily be useless without discovering

(1) What the particular disorder is that is causing the symptoms of Baldness, Greyness, etc. The causes being many and various.

(2) What the particular remedy is for that particular complaint.

But those people who turn away from the much advertised "restoratives"—either for external or internal application—and apply to a specialist meet with quite different results, as witness the following letter addressed to Mr. Warner Oliver, consultant on diseases of the hair, of 4, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, London, W.

This was from a gentleman whose hair had been falling for ten years, and who was, moreover, afflicted with an intense irritation of the scalp. He came to Mr. Warner Oliver and was advised what to do. Shortly afterwards he wrote as follows:—

"Your treatment is giving every satisfaction, the scalp seems now to be quite healthy.

"In past years I have tried everything known, but always found after the first few days that the treatment was injurious, either in the form of extra loss of hair or unbearable irritation.

"The very reverse has been the case this time."

Mr. Warner Oliver is of course the author of that well-known work "The Hair: How to Keep it in Health and Treat it in Disease," which has perhaps the largest circulation in the world of any treatise of the sort.

It is fully illustrated with sketches and diagrams, and is written in a very vivid, telling, and interesting style.

It may not be generally known that Mr. Warner Oliver is willing to send a copy of this work to any of our readers who suffer from hair-complaints of any kind, post free and free also of any charge or obligation. The address to write for this book is 4, Holles-street, Cavendish-square, London, W.

Economics of Furnishing.

How a Renaissance in Popular Taste has been helped by Revolution in Trade Methods.

(By Mrs. MORRISON WILLIAMSON.)

There is not a trade in which such striking developments have occurred in the past five years as the furniture trade. Indeed, a complete revolution has been manifest in the methods of furnishing, and this has proceeded hand-in-hand with a conspicuous improvement in the quality and style of the goods offered to the public.

The elevation of popular taste in furniture is one of the most remarkable facts of our time. It is only natural that the names of individuals should be identified with this change. And particularly in this connection is the name of Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander concerned, for this house was established some few years since with the deliberate, open-eyed intention of fostering, leading, and profiting from the Renaissance in domestic furniture.

One of the instruments with which Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander have succeeded in accomplishing this is the new trade method they have invented. They have revolutionised the instalment plan of buying, and made the purchasing of furniture "out of income" a safe and honourable method, now adopted by all classes of the community.

The clergyman, the doctor, the schoolmaster, and the shopkeeper no longer hesitate to adopt this method. The idea that buying furniture on deferred payments is a disgrace, and only the resort of the unthrifty, is a grievous mistake. But it is not surprising that this idea became prevalent. There are certain houses which seek only a cheap grade trade. The terms and prices they advertise show conclusively that they carry only the commonest goods. It is not disgraceful to buy from such houses, but it is very expensive. There is probably no business house that does not many times in the year resort to using credit, or borrowing money. Many great enterprises are carried out on credit. So that buying furniture on this basis is just as legitimate as renting a furnished house, or a furnished room, or living in a furnished hotel or boarding-house, or as borrowing money at the bank.

Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander commenced their campaign by introducing the system of marking all furniture in plain figures. Then they said to the public: "You can select your furniture and either pay cash, or have it on the deferred payment system. In the latter case, whether the period be six months, or three years, we only make an addition of five per cent. to the marked price. Not five per cent. per annum, or five per cent. per month—just five per cent. whatever period you decide upon.

"For instance, suppose you want £100 worth of furniture and you do not want to pay cash down. Very well, we charge you £105, and all you have to do is to engage to pay either within six months, one year, two years, or three years."

In passing, it may be remarked that certain firms claim not to charge a penny more when goods are bought on the instalment plan. But the speciousness of this claim is made clear by the fact that the same firms advertise that they take "10 per cent. off for cash!" This is very much like the trade device of giving goods away with 1 lb. of tea. Only the very simple imagine that this is pure philanthropy and that the cost does not come out of the tea.

By the logic of their trade methods Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander are breaking down the extravagant custom of renting furnished flats. They point out that by taking a furnished flat you pay more for the mere use of furniture than you pay by taking an unfurnished flat and buying the furniture on their system of deferred payments. Your outlay per quarter is actually less, and the furniture is your own property.

There are probably no fewer than 5,000 men of the professional class in London to-day who are paying a rental of from £250 to £350 a year for the use of a furnished flat. It is a fact that they could obtain in every way similar flats unfurnished for from £75 to £120 a year. In addition, they could purchase better and more complete furniture than they now use on a payment of, say, £100 a year, and this furniture would be their own property at the end of, say, three years.

This, however, is only part of the revolution brought about by this progressive house, which has also organised an elaborate system of provincial representation in the chief centres. Within three hours of receiving a telephone call at the head office, or communication by post, an expert in furnishing, representing Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander, will call at any address in the principal towns and act for them just as if he were one of themselves. Nor does it matter how remote from a railway station an address may be, the firm are ready to send a representative anywhere. The transaction in view need not be a large one. It may be only an order for £20, £40, £80, or £100, but the attention to the customer will be the same.

In order that a purchaser living in the provinces should feel that he is having the same attention as those residing in London, Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander arrange to dispatch goods packed in their own van at their door, and only unpacked at the destination. By these means the trouble of packing and unpacking is avoided, and the goods arrive at a distance of 500 miles in precisely the same manner as they are delivered in London.

And, obvious to the eye of anyone who visits the many-storied many-acred establishment at 252, 253, 254, 255, and 256, Tottenham Court-road, are the beauty, variety, and originality of the furniture stocked by Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander.

It is in the general scheme of furnishing that the character of a furniture firm is seen. Anybody can sell furniture in a way. They can advertise chairs, tables, and suites much as they would sell potatoes. But the test of the furnisher is the manner in which he is prepared to complete the house. Nowadays, the intelligent man desires something artistic, satisfying, and distinctive in the treatment of hearth and window. Special attention to these and other details has been given by Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander, who, personally, and through their special representatives, are always ready to suggest and advise in any particular case. Nothing is charged for this attention to the customer's interests or tastes. Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander are certainly intent on present trade and turnover; but far above these they esteem the building up of a reputation, the further establishing of their good name.

There are more well-furnished homes in Britain than in any other country on earth. It is the most highly civilised country, and the homes that comprise it the best-furnished. Whether civilisation produces furniture or furniture produces civilisation is an open question. Certainly there is a refining influence about a well-furnished room. Aside from the aesthetic or artistic view of the case there is the consideration of comfort. Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander have designed their furniture for practical use, for comfort, and for convenience. Hitherto the man of artistic taste and only moderate means has had to associate the purchase of furniture on credit with furniture that only offends his artistic sense.

The heads of this firm have had extensive experience not only in England, but on the Continent and in America. There are not, indeed, two greater authorities in the trade, and their furniture represents the latest and best obtainable in all lands.

The huge catalogue published by Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander is really a complete guide to house furnishing of all kinds. It is an expensive production, yet the firm offer to send it post free on application. Besides the mere list of goods and the countless illustrations, it contains much useful information to the furniture-buyer.

If you are in the country write for this catalogue before buying furniture. If you are in London procure the catalogue, and also remember that Messrs. Wolfe & Hollander invite you to inspect their premises.

When the roots are not healthy and strong, or when they are affected by germs, YOUR HAIR will not—indeed, cannot—grow. That is why

NOTHING CAN be ANY GOOD for

HAIR

which is FALLING OUT or prematurely GREY

Magnified diseased hair as seen through the microscope, showing how all its connections at the bottom were destroyed by germs, after which it became loose, and simply fell out. This hair is now under the microscope in the Capsuloid Company's office.

Magnified, strong, healthy hair, as seen through the microscope, showing how its healthy root was so firmly fastened at the bottom that when it was pulled it tore away all the surrounding tissues from the bottom of the follicle. This hair is under the microscope in the Capsuloid Company's office.

LOOK AT THIS PICTURE OF A HAIR GREATLY MAGNIFIED, and learn how your hair grows, why it becomes prematurely grey, why it does not grow well, and why it falls out. The whole hair is produced by the multiplication of those growing cells which lie at the bottom and form its roots. They rest upon the little blood vessels which carry the blood from which the cells draw all their nourishment. You can easily see from this picture that when the harmful germs settle in those growing cells and go on multiplying they will injure the cells, loosen and fall out, or which causes the hair to become prematurely grey. If those germs are not checked they will in time quite destroy the cells, and as the roots would then be dead, it is clear no hair could ever grow from a dead root.

Those germs must, then, be killed quickly, and the only medicine ever discovered which will do it is—

"Jasmine Cottage, Tullet-place, London, S.W

"Dear Sirs,—I have much pleasure in telling you I have derived great benefit from Capsuloids. My hair was falling out very much, but they quickly stopped it, and now new hair is growing fast. My hair is in a better and more healthy condition than it has been for some years. It still continues to improve, and other people are noticing it also. I shall always take Capsuloids when I find my hair falling, or out of condition. "Yours truly, (Miss) LUCY SELMES."

MINING EXPLORATION COMPANY.

The Technical Director endorses the policy of the Board.

The Secretary has issued the following circular, dated May 13, to the Shareholders:—I have pleasure in informing you that Mr. R. Gilman Brown, who recently joined the Board as Technical Director, has returned from his inspection trip to Chili. The result of his investigation is that the policy which your Directors have adopted in making provision for full transport facilities, providing for enlarged reduction plant, and pushing this work forward contemporaneously with the work on the mines, effecting thus the earliest realisation on your investment, is fully endorsed by him. By the time the smelter will be operating at its full capacity of 36,000 tons of ore a year, we shall be able to produce matte giving an annual net profit of £110,000 on the basis of copper at £90 per ton. The expectations are that by that time the mines can produce 72,000 tons annually of ore averaging 8 per cent., which will more than double this profit of £110,000; provision for the necessary increase in the capacity of the smelter has been made. In the meantime, our matte product will have reached a marketable value of £86,000, with copper taken at the same price as mentioned above.

CHOICAS.—Of the estimated tonnage of 72,000 tons, the greater part will come from the Choicas Mine. The reasons for this statement are as follows:—The ore taken out by the former owners and by ourselves has come from above a large fault—we have cut below this fault on the 10-metre level and have now showing 52 feet, averaging 11 per cent. During the present winter (May to September), we expect to open this up on the second adit level, which is 32 metres below the upper adit. It seems certain that the ore we have hitherto been mining has been broken off from the ore in the 10-metre level by the above-mentioned fault, and we are justified in expecting that on this lower unfaulted portion of the vein that ore will have at least the same longitudinal extent that is shown in the faulted portion. On this basis we expect that every 100 feet in depth will yield from 50,000 to 70,000 tons of ore. Once the second adit level has been driven in under the ore in the 10-metre level, thus showing the length of this ore body to be what we surmise, the future of the mine is as well assured as we can possibly wish. There is no reason to believe that the grade of ore will change before water level is reached, even if then. This point is as yet undetermined, but it is certainly not above the level of the canyon directly in front of the mine, and is very probably several hundred feet lower than that. This canyon is 180 metres (600 feet) below the No. 1 adit, so that we have as a minimum 600 feet, and as a maximum possibly several times this depth before the grade should be materially lessened. All the above calculations are made on the basis of 8 per cent. ore, whereas, as above stated, the ore in the 10-metre level averages 11 per cent. There are strong indications of the ore going further into the mountain towards the south, and steps will be taken as early as possible to prospect this part of the property.

VICTORIA.—This property is distinctly interesting as it presents a very long series of copper-bearing outcrops. On account of its unusual characteristics, development work at present has not definitely proved its condition at depth, but ore has been mined elsewhere in the same belt at a depth of several hundred feet, and there are small but promising showings of good grade ore in our Victoria tunnel 200 feet below the outcrop. We have determined during the next season (September to May) to drive the above-mentioned tunnel completely under the outcrop, and at the same time open up quarries on the surface at two or three points where outcrop indications are exceedingly promising. Here, as in Choicas, we have no reason to fear that the ore owes its copper values to the surface conditions, as the bottom of the canyon level (which must be water level) is certainly not less than 2,000 feet below the outcrops. This ore being disseminated in the form of bornite through the mass of formation will be treated by concentration in the neighbourhood of the mine, and the concentrates shipped to the smelter. If this concentrating ore is found to average only 3 per cent., very handsome profits can be made out of it. With regard to these two mines (Choicas and Victoria), our Technical Director strongly recommends that they should be treated as one property, and not formed into subsidiary companies, for the following reasons:—(a) The concentrates from the Victoria Mine will be eminently suitable for mixture with the Choicas ores and will simplify and probably cheapen smelting operations. (b) The full value and extent of the Victoria Mine being at present undetermined, the best interests of the Shareholders will be served by the development of both properties being kept in their own hands, at any rate for the present.

HUANACO.—The Huanaco and other properties will be worthy of investigation later, but for the present all our energies must be concentrated on the Choicas and Victoria Mines.

RANDFONTEIN ESTATES GOLD MINING COMPANY,

WITWATERSRAND, LIMITED.

The London Agents have received the following cable from the head office of the Company in Johannesburg dated 7th May, 1907:—

"With reference to the Resolutions which it is stated were adopted in London on Friday last at a Meeting of Shareholders of Randfontein Estates Company, and which were published in the newspapers in London and cabled to the Press here, the Board of Directors of the Company deem it advisable that they should again place before the Shareholders the exact position of the Randfontein group of Mines; and they first of all give an emphatic denial to the statements made in a Circular which they are informed has been issued to Shareholders there by the conveners of the Meeting. The statements about the enormous cost of management charges in connection with the administration of the Randfontein Companies are absolutely false; the Board of Directors have a full statement of similar costs of Companies controlled by other groups, and there are none that can show the same favourable results as far as administrative and management charges are concerned. The Directors are doing their utmost to bring eight subsidiary Companies, in addition to the four now working, to a producing stage as soon as possible, and every effort is being made to achieve the object they have in view. The Chairman, Mr. J. B. Robinson, is giving his personal attention to all these matters, and is rendering the Companies every assistance. Financially, and in the recruitment of labour, it is beyond any doubt that the Robinson Group has never been in such a favourable position as it is to-day; the labour supply exceeds the demand, and the moment is being taken advantage of to push forward in the most energetic manner the development of the subsidiaries and their equipment. To achieve this desirable end money is required. The greater part of the funds held by Randfontein Company at the present time in cash and debentures was subscribed for the sole purpose of acquiring other properties and for developing its subsidiaries. The Directors have no right to distribute these funds as dividends to Shareholders. It is anticipated that, if nothing unforeseen occurs, Randfontein Companies will be producing in eighteen months or two years about seventy-five thousand ounces of gold per month. It is then that substantial dividends will be forthcoming and distributed among Shareholders. To interfere with the beneficial policy of the Directors at present would be to wreck the future of Randfontein. The Board may state at once that they will not allow any interference with their policy, which they consider to be for the best interests of Shareholders, nor will they submit to any dictation from an irresponsible coterie of Shareholders who know absolutely nothing of the condition of things prevailing here, and who, in their ignorance of these conditions, or through some other motive, seek to influence Shareholders to assist them in wrecking the Randfontein property; and the Board of Directors desire to impress upon Shareholders that if the proposed action which has been set on foot by the coterie is adopted, that it will not only result in a serious depreciation of their holdings, but that many innocent Shareholders, who are being misled, will suffer great loss through the designs of these men. It is well known that there is a bitter feeling entertained by certain men towards the Robinson Group at the success of its labour recruitment, and the opening up of so many new Mines on the Randfontein property. It is also quite clear that this extensive development for the good of the Shareholders is not appreciated by those whose policy is opposed for political reasons to any fresh development of mines on the Rand. It is most fortunate that the Directors have had the foresight to husband the resources of Randfontein, as it enables them to finance the new mines and bring them to a producing stage, thus enhancing the value of this extensive and valuable property. The Board has now placed before Shareholders its views on this important matter, and, in conclusion, the Board feels that it is in duty bound to again warn Shareholders that any attempt to restrict the operations now proceeding on Randfontein, or to interfere with the policy of the Board, will lead to disastrous results. The Board is now preparing a comparative statement of the administration and management expenses of the Randfontein and other groups on the Rand, and will post same to all Shareholders by next mail.

SECRETARY AND OFFICES.

HERBERT A. GRIMSDICK, 122, Victoria-street, Westminster, London, S.W.

This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring the patent rights for the United Kingdom and other parts of the world for the Renard Train, and in conjunction therewith the business as a going concern of Ed. Surcouf et Cie, of Billancourt, Paris.

The Company will take over the works of Messrs. Surcouf, with the plant, machinery, fixtures, and stock.

To provide for the early execution of orders, &c., a manufacturing agreement will be entered into with The Daimler Motor Company (1904), Limited, thus ensuring excellence of manufacture and prompt delivery. The basis of the agreement will be a division of profits on sale between this Company and the Daimler Company. Commenting on this, the Times of March 11th, 1907, says: "The best guarantee of the value and potentialities of Colonel Renard's invention—shown for the first time in England, although it has been at work for a substantial period in France—is that the Daimler Company, one of the most flourishing and best-managed houses of Automobile Manufacturers in the world, has held it to be worth while to undertake the sole manufacture of the Renard Train, not for Great Britain only, but for the whole world outside France."

The works at Billancourt are now being enlarged in order to be capable of an output of about 100 trains per annum.

The system has been fully reported upon by the following eminent authorities: Colonel R. E. Crompton, C.B., R.E., M.Inst.C.E., M.Inst.E.E., &c., and Mr. A. A. Campbell Swinton, M.Inst.C.E., M.Inst.E.E., &c.

The Company has also orders in hand to supply three Renard Trains for the French War Department.

The profit on the orders in hand will more than suffice to provide the Preference Dividend of 7 per cent. on the 125,000 Preferred Shares for the first year.

The rapid progress which this invention has made, within a short time, and the numerous negotiations in hand, as well as the inquiries from almost all parts of the world, justify the confidence of the Directors in a world-wide development of the business.

The Preferred Shares will be entitled not only to a Cumulative Preferential Dividend of 7 per cent., but to one-third of the surplus profits after the payment of 7 per cent. on the Ordinary Shares. Every additional £3,750 of dividend declared beyond £17,500 will yield a further 1 per cent. on the Preferred Capital.

Applications for Preferred Shares should be sent with a deposit of 2s. 6d. per share to the Company's Bankers, the National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, or the Union Bank of Scotland, Limited, or any of their Branches.

Full Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained from the Company's Bankers, Solicitors, Broker, and Secretary.

Dated May 6th, 1907.

Lanchester Reliability.

Lanchester Cars are noted for their reliability, there is a reason for this. It is not only the perfection of design but the equally necessary perfection in construction which makes the Lanchester reliable. The design is simple and every part of the motor is accessible. A superior design added to the perfection of workmanship make a better motor car just as they make a better rifle or a better watch. Remember, a reliable motor car cannot be made "cheap." It is better to pay a good price for a good car than to buy a cheap one and spend all your time hunting round for repair shops. Practical demonstration is better than big talk and the Lanchester Motor Co. are always ready to arrange trial runs at any of their Depots. Catalogues giving detail descriptions of both the Four and Six cylinder Lanchesters may be had post free on application.

OUR PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons, no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH OFFICE by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a Quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed 12, and must under no circumstances consist of more than 14, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET-STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S-GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,469.

THE FOUR GREATEST MEN IN HISTORY PRIOR TO THE CHRISTIAN ERA: AND THE FOUR GREATEST MEN IN HISTORY SINCE THAT DATE.

A collation of all lists sent in has produced the following "ideal" list, viz.:—

B.C.: Julius Cæsar, Alexander the Great, Moses, Homer.
A.D.: Shakespeare, Napoleon I., Mahomet, St. Paul.

Only two Competitors have sent in lists exactly corresponding with this ideal (viz., ALICUJAS and WILL). The Prize of Two Guineas, therefore, is equally divided between them.

It may be of interest to Competitors generally to know that SOCRATES and PLATO occupy fifth and sixth places among the B.C. great men; while among the A.D. great men ST. PAUL only scores by one point from COLUMBUS and NELSON, who, in turn, are but one point in front of ISAAC NEWTON and LUTHER.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,470.

HUMOROUS POEMS SUPPOSED TO BE WRITTEN BY A "LITTLE BEAST" OF A PET DOG IN ANSWER TO FATHER VAUGHAN'S DIATRIBES.

The Prize of Two Guineas in this Competition is awarded to KISMET, whose poem was printed in TRUTH of April 17 last.

NOTICE.

It has been suggested to me by an Oxford correspondent that, as TRUTH numbers among its readers many classical scholars, both at our universities and public schools, it might be a popular move to give them a turn one week by holding a competition in Latin verse.

But before I come to any definite decision on the point, I should like first to form some idea as to how far such a competition would be taken up. I therefore invite any to whom the suggestion appeals to communicate with me as soon as possible.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,471.

A competitor has suggested to me that in view of the widespread interest evoked by our "Greatest Men" Competition, some weeks back, it would form an interesting supplement to have a "Greatest Women" Competition. And as I rather agree with him, I am proposing this week to act on his suggestion by offering the usual Prize of Two Guineas to that Competitor who shall be most successful in compiling

A LIST OF THE SIX GREATEST WOMEN IN THE WORLD'S HISTORY.

Competitors are not required, as in the "Greatest Men" Competition, to divide their lists equally between B.C. and A.D. history; but may take their "Greatest Women" from any period indiscriminately.

Furthermore, this Competition will not be judged on a plebiscite basis, but the Prize will be awarded to that Competitor whose list the Puzzle Editor considers to be the best.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i.) No Competitor must send in more than one list
(ii.) All lists must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, May 27, at latest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SNOOKS.—Your new nom de plume duly registered.

JETHART.—I note the corrected spelling.

NOTE.—The Puzzle Editor is always glad to receive suggestions for Puzzles and hopes that any reader of TRUTH who may be inspired with a brilliant idea in this direction will not hesitate to send it on to him. He will also be pleased to receive and consider any criticisms Competitors may have to offer, with a view to the possible improvement of existing methods.

Competitors wishing for a reply by post are reminded that they should enclose a stamped addressed envelope and a "TRUTH" coupon, which will be found on the third page of the cover.

Norfolk.

Foremost of England's heroes, he of India's strand
Ruler and overlord, o'er ocean and o'er land,
Rests from the toil of battle and affray,
Until the trumpet call on th' last great day.
Porthos.

Thy memory, Clive,
By that vast nation thou didst bring,
In Britain's heart shall ever live,
And thy sad death with mournful cadence ring.
Mart.

Heroic warrior, statesman bold,
No monument requirest thou;
Thy name and deeds will still be told,
When brass is tarnished, stone laid low.
Dullard.

Hero of Plassey, who founded our great Empire in the East,
Still lives—the golden chain of memory not broken in the least.
So to perpetuate his name, the nation, at this time, would found
A lasting monument to Clive (tho' late), with ev'ry honour, crown'd.
Effie.

Oh, shame to England that she has not crown'd before,
With fame, the hero Clive, who did so much, and more,
Than any soldier born, founding a kingdom grand,
Now to his praises, let all pay tribute in the land.
Jessica.

Statesman—soldier—patriot, born of Britain's will,
To be the nation's law in every clime;
His noble spirit lives in India's life until
The end of time.
Rimabel.

Lord Clive is gone, enshrined in stone, we mourn,
His labour o'er, world-wide fame cannot repay,
Tell me, whence are heroes borne.
Illustrious spirit, rest on till break of day.
Scot.

Your life-work closed ere it was scarce begun,
Your name is in our hearts enshrined,
And this your fame, "Lo, England's son,
Who gave unto his country, India!"
Djalfi.

"Heaven-born general," one of the best,
To thee this stone is raised on high.
Hero of Plassey, peacefully rest,
Thy name, brave soul, can never die.
Spartan.

Empire founder, thou art justly called,
By whose surpassing greatness were enthralled
Far India's myriads. God grant us such as thee,
To keep our Englands flag pure, strong, and free.
Oiseau.

Though empire builders builded on thy strength,
Thy name, deep carved, and lovingly, on plinth
Of Empire, makes memorial; this but stone.
Fair Ind we guard and Plassey, meaning one!
Caledon.

Daring in war! In council bold!
These lie deep-graved on corner-stone
Of England's greatness; God doth hold
Thy faults, thy wealth of gifts we own.
Brad.

"A heaven-born general," far surpassing all,
Hero of Plassey, and undying fame,
India thy valiant exploits would recall.
And commemorate thy glorious name.
Simplex.

Here by this marble to thy memory,
Great captain, homage proud and glad we pay.
Victor of Plassey, thou didst forge the key
Of England's Empire in the East to-day.
Pen.

Each son of Britain he his debtor made;
The gathering years have but the debt increased.
He dreamed of England's future fame and laid
The founding-stone of Empire in the East.
Quilp.

Thy genius won the distant East,
Undaunted warrior soul;
Whose will inspired the greatest, and the least,
On India's deathless roll.
Inca.

Though nations strive no more, and conflicts cease,
Thy fame shall still survive;
Foremost in war, and harbinger of peace,
England's immortal Clive!
Autolycus.

It is not framed by mortal hands,
Or in a pillared stone's extent;
Look eastward where an Empire stands.
Clive's monument.
Lugh.

Heroic Clive! on Plassey's field of fame,
A triple triumph was achieved by thee:
For England, Empire: for thyself, a name;
For India, peace and freedom to grow free.
Eboracum.

Young, dauntless, undeterred,
An Empire's base he laid;
That Empire here records,
Her debt—late paid.
Standian.

Victor of Plassey, thou who didst afford
Safety to India, in her hour of dread,
Quitting the desk to grasp the soldier's sword,
Then, worn with statecraft, join'd the noble dead.
Snap.

Some thirteen decades pass with footsteps slow,
And England wakens in a fervent glow;
Her patriotic ardour all alive,
She cries aloud, "A monument to Clive!"
Maliquant.

Brave, kindly, just; his only aim, the right;
Upholding law, or arming for the fight.
So India's Empire rose: our Clive alone
Fixing full firmly the foundation stone.
H.

The soldier may fight, and the pioneer travel
To heap up rewards that are glitt'ring and massy.
That no man, with honour or justice, may cavil,
This monument stands to Clive, Baron of Plassey.
Dick Maisch.

Vast dream of power! "Primus in Indus," great thy claim,
To found an Empire, worthy of the name.
Warrior and statesman, Clive, thy task was nobly done;
The Empire lives for ever—England thanks her son!
Kicta.

Who, bred to peace, yet born to rule, in youth
Crushed the fierce embers of a wavering war,
Then turned to gentler arts. Now we, in truth,
Behold that mighty Ind, which first, by faith, he saw.
Isobar.

The quiet Shropshire churchyard holds thy dust,
The stone above records thy mortal name;
England and India keep in sacred trust
The immortal glory of thy deathless fame.
Spinel.

Thou warrior, born full-arm'd in Britain's fateful hour,
When wavered, hesitatingly, her Empire-power;
Those laurels, superfluous to thy living brow,
With loving, lasting reverence we offer now.
W. Americus.

A humble civilian's post he went to try,
And hit upon the Imperial throne of Mogul race.
A poor official's pen he chose to ply,
And led twice to glorious victory our Northern race.
Dorset.

Clive, at thy feet, we laurels lay,
For victories won, though far away.
We laggards are. With roses decked
Now haste a statue to erect!
F. H. W.

Who would venture to try and match Robert Browning's "Clive"? I would not myself dare the attempt, but the four last lines of that stirring poem seem to me to be suitable.

"Comfort you, my great unhappy hero, Clive, in that I heard,
Next week how your own hand dealt you doom, and uttered just the word,
'Fearfully courageous!'—this be sure, and nothing else I groaned, I'm no Clive, nor parson either; Clive's worst deed—we'll hope condoned."
Nemo.

To him, the warrior who "Peccavi" wrote,
When adding to our realm a province rare,
This bronze is raised: he dwells in lands remote,
A realm where is nor war, nor sin, nor care.
Almaviva.

After the storm of life has passed,
He rests in peace, who won renown,
And set the fairest jewel fast,
That ever graced an Empire's crown.
Podet.

A ruler born, a continent thy throne,
Bequeathed to England by thy able hand.
Out of thy strength a people's might has grown,
Thine all the honour, theirs a verdant land.
Val Venture.

An Empire-builder, bravest of the brave,
Who to his country once an Empire gave;
She knows to-day he battled for her good—
For her he shed his tears, then shed his blood.
Eggs.

He placed the richest gem on proud Britannia's brow;
He built an Empire in his life's brief span.
His name shall live for aye! A mighty nation now
Proclaims with one accord, "He was a man!"
Felixicus.

On Britain's brow the gem doth rest,
Which thou didst pluck from Asia's breast,
And in its fire thou livest still,
Thy mighty mission to fulfil.
Mary J. Diggens.

Empire in Hind sets forward from thy name;
The Hooghley, Plassey, Arcot blaze thy fame;
Unmoved by friends' dismay or foes' alarms;
Most truly great in council and in arms.
Quatix.

Here this bare tribute. There in Eastern clime
An Empire see—
A monument that will endure through time
To honour thee.
Det nu.

Though, strangely, century and half have rolled
Since Plassey proved the man of action bold;
Yet lapse of years has made it clear as day,
What India's millions owe to British sway.
Iere.

Great Eastern founder! hero, soldier, all—
Sublime thy gift to do thy country's call.
Arcot, and Plassey, ring thy victories won,
Burn bright thy memory, England's greatest son Fish.

Just where he fell, what matters now?
Or where his bones may lie?
While India lives for England, how Can such a memory die?
Walfred.

He held an Empire in his hands,
He left it to his country's care;
And no memorial demands
Whose deathless name is written there.
Dudhope.

The Orient is thy monument: untold
The varied wealth of India wisely won,
For Mother England's crown. O gallant son,
Her Koh-i-Noor set in barbaric gold.
Freda.

ARE YOU TAKING

an everyday care of yourself? Prevention you know is ever so much better than cure. A little irregularity of the stomach seems such a trivial thing to-day, but next week it is a malady, ever getting more serious: little ailments soon become big complaints. Cure that little irregularity at once. Neglect it, and it leads swiftly to dyspepsia, indigestion, flatulence, constipation, biliousness, headache, and perhaps a train of greater evils. Even these will yield to but why run the risk of so much suffering? What folly to delay—waiting till one is ill.

A dose of these famous pills taken whenever the least weariness is experienced will effectually prevent any unpleasant developments. Don't wait till you have to be cured. Take an everyday care of yourself, remember always if you keep the bowels regular and the liver in working order you will never be troubled with indigestion and it's attendant miseries.

"Taking care" of course means that the standard remedy must be always at hand. In many thousands of homes BEECHAM'S PILLS are regarded as the family medicine and are kept in an appointed place always ready for use. When you notice a symptom you want to get rid of it at once: there is no time like the present. To be always prepared, you too, must keep a box of Beecham's Pills

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1586. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, May 22, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 23s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. Cheques and Post Office Orders should be made Payable to the Manager, Truth, "Truth Buildings," Carteret-street, S.W.

ENTRE NOUS.

I DESIRE to remind all readers of Truth that a fund is now open at this office called the "Tress Barry Fund." The object of it is to continue the donation of a new sixpence at Christmas to all the children in the London workhouses and workhouse schools, which the late Sir Francis Tress Barry made annually for twenty-three years before his death. The sixpences will be distributed, as they have been hitherto, in connection with the dolls and toys provided at Christmas out of the Truth Toy Fund; but in order that subscriptions may not be diverted from that fund, I must close the Tress Barry Fund at the end of July, though if it is more convenient to subscribers to give me their promises now, I shall, of course, be content to receive payment of the same any time before Christmas. The amount given by Sir F. Tress Barry in recent years has been 11,000 sixpences, and at least that number is required if the sixpences are to go round. Although it may seem a large number, in point of fact it only amounts to £275. The object in view must appeal to all, and if only all will respond—even to the extent of a few sixpences—the amount will soon be raised. I hope, therefore, that every reader of Truth will contribute something, and at as early a date as possible.

As already mentioned, a number of contributions were spontaneously offered before the Fund was started, and it was this which has encouraged me to make the appeal which I am now making to my readers generally. The number of sixpences promised in this way was over 1,200, in amounts ranging from one to four hundred. In addition to these promises, I have also received 1,029 sixpences in cash. The following is a list of these contributions, in sixpences, and future receipts will be acknowledged in the same way from time to time:—

The King will hold a Levee in the Throne Room of St. James's Palace on the afternoon of Monday, June 3, and another (which will be the last for this season) either during the last week in next month, or on Monday, July 1.

The third Court of the season is to be held by the King and Queen in the Ball Room of Buckingham Palace on the night of Thursday, June 6. The fourth and last Court will probably be held by their Majesties either on Friday, June 14, or on Friday, June 28.

The King arrived at Newmarket last week on Monday evening just in time to dine with Sir Ernest Cassel at Moulton Paddocks. His Majesty stayed at the Jockey Club until Thursday afternoon, when he returned to London directly after the races. The King dined on Tuesday at Queensberry House with Lord Wolverton, and on Wednesday at Palace House with Mr. Leopold de Rothschild.

On Saturday evening his Majesty arrived at Reigate Priory on a visit to Captain and Mrs. Ronald Greville, whose house-party consisted of Count Albert Mensdorff, Lady Sarah Wilson, Lord and Lady Brougham, Lady Norreys, Mr. and Mrs. George Keppel, Sir Ernest Cassel, Mr. and Mrs. Hwfa Williams, and Mrs. Naylor; besides Major Holford, who was in waiting on his Majesty. On Sunday afternoon the King drove to Polesden Lacey, the beautiful domain of the late Sir Clinton Dawkins, near Dorking, which has been purchased by Captain and Mrs. Greville, who will take up their residence there in the autumn. The King is expected to arrive at Sandringham this evening for a brief stay, after which he will return to Buckingham Palace until Monday, June 17, when the Court will remove to Windsor Castle for Ascot race week.

The King's visit to Lord and Lady Lansdowne at Bowood Park, Wiltshire, which has been twice postponed, is to take place in July, and will be a "week-end" affair, and, of course, quite private. The King will travel by special train from Paddington to Chippenham, and is to drive thence to Bowood, returning to town by the same route. Extensive improvements and alterations have lately been carried out at Bowood, and the house is now lighted throughout by electricity.

The Queen and Princess Victoria, who proceeded to Corfu on leaving Athens, are now on their homeward voyage from the Mediterranean, and they will land from the Royal yacht at Portsmouth Harbour when they arrive in England next week, and are to travel thence by special Royal train to Victoria Station, where they will be met by the King. Princess Victoria may possibly accompany the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife next month on a cruise in the Duke of Sutherland's yacht Catania, which they have hired for a few weeks.

The King and Queen of Denmark are to arrive at Port Victoria on Saturday, June 8, from Flushing, in the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, and they will be received on landing by the Prince and Princess of Wales. It had been proposed that King Frederick and Queen Louise should land at Portsmouth, but this arrangement has been altered, as their Majesties will embark at Portsmouth for Cherbourg when they leave England on Thursday, June 13. It is understood that the King and Queen of Denmark have finally settled to proceed to Paris, on their official visit to the President of the French Republic, after their stay in England, instead of going first to France, as was originally proposed. It is expected that they will pay a visit to Queen Wilhelmina and the Prince Consort of the Netherlands at The Hague during the first week in June, just before they come to England.

It is probable that a State banquet will be given at Buckingham Palace on Saturday, June 8, in honour of the King and Queen of Denmark. On Sunday, the 9th, there will most likely be a family dinner party at Marlborough House. On Tuesday, the 11th, there is to be a gala performance at the Opera. The State ball will probably be given on Wednesday, the 12th. As to the days, one will be occupied with a State visit to the City, another is to be devoted to a review and luncheon at Aldershot, and a third will be spent at Windsor Castle. If a garden party is given at Windsor this year by the King and Queen, it will take place on the only available day during the visit of the King and Queen of Denmark, but if there is no garden party, King Frederick and Queen Louise will probably spend the afternoon of Sunday, June 9, at Windsor Castle, in which case they will be accompanied from town by their Majesties and the Prince and Princess of Wales.

The arrangements for the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Lord Tredegar at Tredegar Park have been cancelled, and there is very great disappointment in South Wales at this change of plans. The Prince and Princess were to have stayed at Tredegar from Saturday, June 8, until Monday, the 10th, and on the Monday they were to visit the show of the Bath and Western and Southern Counties Agricultural Society at Newport. It seems that they must meet the King and Queen of Denmark when they land in England, and their arrival is now fixed for Saturday, June 8. The Prince of Wales is to visit the show at Newport on Thursday, June 6, when he will travel down in the morning from Paddington, returning to town late in the afternoon. His Royal Highness will not be accompanied by the Princess.

Princess Henry of Battenberg will proceed to Germany when she leaves Spain, and, after taking a course of waters at Kissingen, she is to pay a visit to her sister-in-law, the grand Duchess Marie of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, at Schloss Rosenau. Princess Henry will return to England towards the end of June, when she is to take up her residence at Kensington Palace for a short time before going to the Isle of Wight for the summer.

Prince and Princess Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden are to arrive in England towards the end of the second week in June, and they will be the guests of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught at Clarence House during their stay in London, and will be included in the Bagshot Park party for Ascot races.

The Duke and Duchess of Sparta are expected to arrive in England from Greece about the middle of next month, and during their stay in London they will be the guests of the King and Queen at Buckingham Palace, and they are to be included in their Majesties' house party at Windsor Castle during Ascot race week.

On leaving England, the Duke and Duchess of Sparta will proceed to Germany.

The appointment of Lord Allendale to the office of Captain of the Yeomen of the Guard, in the place of the Duke of Manchester, resigned, has given much satisfaction in political circles, as he is the head of a family which has always supported the Liberal Party, and he is a very rich man, and exercises great influence in the North of England. The Duke of Manchester has been absent from England for several months on a tour round the world. The members of the Household who hold Ministerial places are now required to be most regular in their attendance in the House of Lords, which is in accordance with the system which was established by Lord Palmerston. The King does not sanction the absence of members of the Household from any ceremonials at which they are expected to be on duty, unless such absence is caused either by family mourning or by illness. There has been an end of the easy-going arrangements which had gradually become the rule during the later years of Queen Victoria's reign.

The Lord Steward of the Household and the Lord Chamberlain have always enjoyed special precedence, but no such privilege appertained to the equally important and dignified office of Master of the Horse until the anomaly was rectified the other day by special command of the King, formally issued through the Earl Marshal. The Mastership of the Horse is the most coveted of the Great Household offices, for the salary is £2,500 a year, and there are some valuable privileges and perquisites, including the use of the Royal horses and carriages, with the attendance of the servants belonging to the same. There is plenty of work for the Master of the Horse if he likes to do it, but if he is disposed to be idle all the routine duties fall to the Crown Equerry.

Major Alexander George Fullerton, who died last week at the age of ninety-nine, was a brother-in-law of the late Lord Grenville, to whose eldest sister (Lady Georgiana Leveson-Gower) he was married at Paris (where her father was then Ambassador) in July, 1833. At Eton he was next in school to Mr. Gladstone. Major Fullerton served for many years in the Royal Horse Guards and the 2nd Life Guards, and he commanded the former regiment at the funeral of George IV. at Windsor Castle, which ceremony took place at night by torchlight. Major Fullerton's only son died young, and he is succeeded in his estates by his nephew, Mr. George F. D. Fullerton, of Shenfield Hall. Lady Georgiana Fullerton was a very clever and remarkably accomplished woman and the author of several highly successful novels.

The sudden death of Mrs. John Dillon, at her husband's residence in Dublin, last week, is deeply regretted by all, even those who differed most widely from Mr. John Dillon's political views. Mrs. Dillon was intellectual and cultured; her personal charm was great, and the amiability of her character attached to her a large circle of friends, by whom her loss is deeply deplored. She was the eldest daughter of Sir James Mathew, late Lord Justice of Appeal in England, who is now an invalid. Mrs. Dillon was an enthusiastic supporter of her husband's politics, but, like most ladies in Ireland, took no public part in promoting them.

Colonel Fosbery, who died at Bath the other day, invented the Paradox gun and the automatic revolver, and for many years he devoted much attention to the improvement of machine guns. He served for many years in the Bengal Army, and greatly distinguished himself during the Umbeyla Expedition of 1863, when he received the Victoria Cross for his gallantry in successfully leading a forlorn hope. Colonel Fosbery belonged to one of the oldest families in Wiltshire, which has been seated at Fosbery since the Conquest.

Mr. Chick, of Compton Valence, Dorsetshire, who died a few days ago, was one of the largest farmers in the South of England, and widely known through his famous flock of horned sheep, which is probably the finest in the world. Mr. Chick was noted as a judge of sheep, cattle, and horses, and his services were in great request at many of the principal agricultural shows.

A superb copy of the First Folio Shakespeare is to be sold next week at Sotheby's, and it will be interesting to see whether it excites more competition than the Locker Lampson copy, which fetched £3,600 a few weeks ago. This last copy was purchased about the middle of the seventeenth century by Colonel Lane, of King's Bromley, Staffordshire, and it remained in the possession of his family until the sale of the Lane Library, about fifty years ago, when it was bought by the late Lord Gosford for only one hundred and fifty-seven guineas. The present Lord Gosford sold this copy in 1884 to James Toovey, the well-known bookseller, for £470. It is bound in red morocco by Payne. Lord Gosford certainly parted with the book for too low a price, although it was thrice as much as the ridiculous sum for which it had been purchased by his father. This copy carries the book-plate of the Lanes of King's Bromley, which was engraved by Hogarth. There is also a Third Folio (1663), which contains not only the seven doubtful plays, but also the portrait printed on the title, with the verses opposite. This was formerly in Sir James Langham's library at Cottesbrooke Park, Northamptonshire, and it is probably unique.

It is interesting as well as encouraging to find the head of a big firm enunciating certain principles in regard to newspaper advertising which have been constantly preached in Truth. Mr. A. W. Gamage did this last week in addressing the shareholders of his company. After pointing out the injury that is done to honest trade by dishonest advertising, he went on to say:—

> He hoped to see the press in general exercise at an early date a strict censorship over every advertisement, and laws passed making it a criminal offence to issue an advertisement which, upon its face, was likely to obtain money from the public on what virtually amounted to false pretences.

I presume he means that the law should have regard to the publisher of the advertisement as well as its responsible author, for the criminal law is already strong enough to deal with the actual advertiser who obtains money from the public by false pretences. It is the responsibility of the publisher that requires to be established, and, as I have often said, I should have no objection to an Act which made the publisher equally responsible with the advertiser for any announcement which has a criminal end in view.

But might I suggest to Mr. Gamage that it is open to question whether the law is not strong enough for that purpose? The recent conviction of the Editor of Judy for publishing an advertisement knowing it to have a criminal object seems to me to be equally applicable to advertisements designed to obtain money by false pretences. Not being a lawyer, I do not profess to speak with confidence on this point; but it strikes me that the principal difficulty in the way of obtaining the conviction of a newspaper, as the law now stands, for publishing such an advertisement probably lies in bringing home to the publisher knowledge of the criminal purpose—or what lawyers call "proving the scienter." There are plenty of cases, however—they are constantly being pointed out in Truth—in which no jury would hesitate to find that the publisher, or any one else with an ordinary knowledge of the world and his own business, knows perfectly well the character of what he is publishing. At any rate, it would be well worth the while of any one who feels strongly on this point to raise the question in the Law Courts.

There is another point in Mr. Gamage's speech which was made only a few weeks ago in these columns. Coming from a large advertiser, the passage is worth quoting:—

> The public confidence was a plant of such tender growth that the press and the adv rtiser should work together for mutual protection. Substitution in the shop was an evil, but wilful misrepresentation in a printed advertisement in the press should not be tolerated, and no price was too high to pay to any paper the readers of which had absolute faith in its contents. . . . There was a building in the City—a very fine building—and nearly all its offices were empty. He (Mr. Gamage) was told the reason was this: They had been unfortunate enough to get many long-firm swindles into that building. The consequence is the building has got a bad name, and people would not go there. If you applied that argument to the press it would be found in time that if people got tricked by advertisements in certain papers, as in the case of the offices mentioned, people would shun that paper, and would not take space.

This is precisely what was said in an article on "The Press and the Advertiser" in Truth of March 27. But what was pointed out there, and what requires to be remembered, is that this matter rests almost entirely with the advertisers. Apparently there are a great many who do not appreciate that the mere extent of its circulation is not a conclusive test of the value of a paper as an advertising medium. The amount of confidence which the readers place in the advertisements is an important element, and it stands to reason that when a paper habitually publishes advertisements of a more or less fraudulent character, involving every day the robbery of a certain number of its readers, the number who close their eyes to the advertisements it publishes must increase day by day.

Nothing astonishes me more in connection with the advertising business than to see that respectable firms will pay their money day after day and week after week for the exhibition of their announcements side by side with those of notorious swindlers. Only when they appreciate that such expenditure is likely to do them as much harm as good will newspaper managers find it necessary, as a matter of business, to exclude all fraudulent and doubtful advertisements from their columns. It is quite true, as Mr. Gamage says, that "no price is too high to pay to any paper, the readers of which have absolute faith in its contents." This truth cannot be too widely known. But it is equally true that no price is too low to pay to any paper, the readers of which have no faith in its contents. And this truth is very far from being adequately appreciated at present.

A correspondent writes:—

> In the arithmetic paper set at the Solicitors' Preliminary Examination this week—May 1—the following question was asked:—
> Q. 6.—If a cubic foot of water weighs 62.5 pounds, find the volume of water which weighs a ton, and the depth, to the nearest inch, to which it would fill a square tank, each of whose sides measures 3ft. 3in.?

Seeing that a square tank, each of whose sides measures 3ft. 3in., has six sides of that (inside) measurement, the uppermost of which may or may not be open, the capacity of such a tank would be $(3.25\text{ft.})^3$, viz., 34.328 125 cubic feet.

Further, as one cubic foot of water weighs 62.5 pounds, one ton (2,240 pounds) of water would contain 35.84 cubic feet. Therefore the volume of one ton of water would exceed the capacity of the tank by 1.511 874 cubic feet; and to say what depth to the nearest inch to which it would fill the tank is impossible.

A Cambridge friend, to whom I have submitted this problem, points out that my correspondent assumes that the tank is cubical, whereas the question merely states that it is "a square tank," giving its area, but saying nothing about its depth. I presume that this is the explanation of the alleged impossibility. But it is a pity that examiners do not study the art of expressing themselves in unambiguous language.

From a gentleman who is familiar with the terms and circumstances of the Uppingham and Oakham trusts, but not a trustee or governor himself, I have received a letter disputing the accuracy of certain points in the letter of the Vicar of Whaplode published last week. He states that of the money in question "two-sevenths go to Uppingham School, two-sevenths to Oakham School, while three-sevenths go to the hospital, or rather the Bede house pensioners." He contends that Mr. Rhodes' words do not accurately describe this, but really this is a question of words rather than of substance. Again, he points out that under a scheme approved by H.M. in Council, May 15, 1875, "conditions are laid down in regard to exhibitions with special privileges to boys from elementary schools in Oakham and Uppingham," etc., which is by way of answer to the Vicar's complaint about "the great and affluent" profiting by the Whaplode tithes. As regards this point, Mr. Rhodes has already stoutly maintained that his words are justified by the facts, but whether they are or not is rather a side issue.

"The most important point of all, however," writes my present correspondent, "is that the Governors are strictly bound by the Trust, and limited by the Scheme of the Endowed Schools Commission." Undoubtedly. And that is the point to which Mr. Rhodes addressed himself last week, and to which my remarks were directed. Mr. Rhodes contends that the terms of the trust under which the tithes are held impose certain duties upon the Rectors, and that those duties have been neglected. That is the only point of any public interest, and surely it is a matter of fact which is capable of being pretty conclusively proved or disproved, without reference to the question whether Mr. Rhodes has or has not used too strong language about the destination of the educational endowments.

The Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge, have presented the Rev. M. Reed, Vicar of St. Thomas's, Nottingham, to the living of Ware (net stipend about £400 a year, with house), which has become vacant by the promotion of Canon Appleton to the Mastership of Selwyn College, Cambridge.

The Archbishop of Armagh, who celebrated his eighty-third birthday the other day, is to preach at Oxford, before the University, on Sunday, June 23. Archbishop Alexander was appointed to the See of Derry (which was then worth nearly £7,000 a year) in 1867 by Lord Derby, on the recommendation of the Duke of Abercorn, who was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. He was translated to the Archbishopric of Armagh in 1896.

Sir Richard Graham, of Netherby, has presented the Rev. Henry Taylor, late Vicar of Wrockwardine, Shropshire, to the rectory of Kirkandrews-on-Esk, Cumberland, which is now one of the most valuable livings in the diocese of Carlisle, being of the net value of over £600 a year, with house.

Bishop Legge has collated Bishop Anson to the Chancellorship of Lichfield Cathedral, an office which was held by the late Canon Lonsdale for fifty years. The second residentiary stall in the Cathedral is annexed to the Chancellorship, so that Bishop Anson vacates the fourth stall, to which he was collated in 1898, and which has been filled by the appointment of Archdeacon Hodgson. Bishop Anson, who is a brother of the late Lord Lichfield, held the Canadian see of Qu'Appelle from 1884 until 1892, when he retired to England, having accepted the office of Warden of St. John's Hospital, Lichfield.

The appointment of Lord Kinnaird as Lord High Commissioner to the General Assembly has given much satisfaction in the North, because he is well known as a staunch Evangelical, and therefore an opponent of the movement of a section of the Presbyterian clergy for the development of the Church of Scotland along sacerdotal lines. The acceptance of the office of Lord High Commissioner by a peer of warm Evangelical sympathies is very popular among all the old-fashioned Presbyterians, and is also favourably regarded by the Free Church, and it has certainly been generally beneficial to the Government in Scotland.

I am asked to mention that the testimonial to Mr. John Kirk will be presented to him at a meeting at the Mansion House at three o'clock on Friday next, May 24, but the subscription list will remain open until Friday morning, and those who are still desirous of subscribing should send their donations to Mr. W. J. Osman, 10, Museum Mansions, London, W.C. As has been already mentioned, the King is to receive Mr. Kirk at Buckingham Palace on Thursday to congratulate him personally upon his work.

The views of working men on the subject of the Army are generally of interest, and the following letter which I have received from a Yorkshire town is no exception to the rule:—

As a working man, seeing that about half the produce of the workers' labour goes to the upkeep of the Army and Navy, and payment of interest on the National Debt, I think the workers are entitled to a run for their money. We pay our officers good salaries for doing nothing. We should like to see what sort of men they are in actual combat, so that we can weed out the unfit—say a thousand English generals versus a thousand Germans of the same rank, armed only with nine-inch daggers, the survivors to be awarded special distinctions. We want an International Tournament, run on the same lines as our football league matches, the finals to be fought out in the different capitals of Europe. It would give the people a good idea of how the brave die fighting.

This would be something like a military tournament, and no doubt it would do a great deal to popularise the Army in a certain sense. It will be noticed that my correspondent's military ideal is rather the opposite of that of the National Service League; in fact, quite that of the sportsmen whose sport consists in looking on at sports. I am afraid that we could not put a thousand generals into the field at present, whatever may be the case of Germany, but there is no saying what we might do in course of time. As a taxpayer, I should be opposed to the creation of a thousand generals ad hoc—it would make the international military tournament a little too expensive. Would my correspondent feel equally interested in the sport if we made up the deficiency by training a few hundred junior officers for the nine-inch dagger business? If he thinks that we really have a thousand generals on the list, perhaps that explains his idea that "half the produce of the workers' labour" goes to the up-keep of the Army and Navy, etc.

An officer sends me the following mysterious official document which recently passed through his hands:—

Regret to inform you that Pte. ———, admitted to hospital this morning, is dangerously ill, suffering from N.Y.D.

This may interest "the faculty" who are always on the look-out for new complaints. In point of fact, however, it seems that N.Y.D. stands for "Not yet diagnosed."

Judging from a description I have received of certain new cook-houses that have been put up for the benefit of officers and N.C.O.s at Kilworth Camp, domestic architecture still remains one of those subjects in which the Army is not particularly strong. An officers' cook-house, measuring about 18 ft. by 9 ft., has no ventilation except by two windows on one side and a door at the end; the range only contains one oven; and there is not a shelf in the apartment. Any one with the slightest knowledge of such matters can see that it is quite impossible to cook for a mess of from twenty-eight to forty men with one oven—to say nothing of the fact that there is no other place but the oven for warming plates, so that it is impossible to combine a hot dinner with hot plates. In the absence of proper ventilation, which should, of course, be in the roof, the place will often be as ill-suited for the cooks as for those whose meals they have to serve. These buildings are roofed with iron and lined with match-board, which again does not seem to be an ideal style of architecture for a kitchen.

Since referring the other day to the case of the dockyard writers, I have received a great deal of information about the details of their case; and I see that a meeting has been held at Portsmouth in which the "concessions" recently granted by the Admiralty were condemned, collectively and in detail. It would require more space than I can afford to discuss the various objections to the new scheme which the Admiralty has put forth. But, speaking generally and with full knowledge of the circumstances, I must say that these men seem to be most shabbily treated. They practically comprise the whole of the clerical staff of the shore establishments of the Admiralty, and the higher grades occupy positions of considerable responsibility, requiring a certain amount of education, and a great deal of special knowledge and experience. They are worked very hard, and excessive demands are frequently made upon them in the matter of overtime. But none of them occupy in point of emolument the position of a corresponding class of men in private employment, and the lower grades are worse off, both in pay and prospects, than any class of clerks doing similar work. The joint stock banks are a by-word for their sweating proclivities; but I doubt if any of their clerks are as shabbily treated as these servants of the Admiralty; and they may well chafe under the meagre and delusive scheme which has been evolved with so much delay and reluctance under the pretence of redressing their grievances. Considering how lavishly money is expended on the Navy, there is no excuse whatever for this state of things, and some attempt ought to be made in Parliament to impress upon "My Lords" tho meaning of the "model employer" doctrine.

A great disappointment has been caused to the Taw and Torridge fishermen by the decision of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries upon an application for an amendment of the by-law with reference to the size of the mesh of the nets that may be used. The men have long contended that the size insisted upon is excessively large, allowing a fish from 2½ lb. to 3 lb. to go through the mesh, and so preventing the catching in these rivers of quantities of mullet and bass from 1 lb. to 2 lb. in weight. With the permission of the Board in Whitehall, the Taw and Torridge Fishery Conservators had some experiments made with a mesh reduced in size to allow the catching of fish from 1 lb. in weight upwards. Not a single salmon was caught, but a quantity of coarse fish, and the Conservators then unanimously recommended the change in the mesh for which the men had petitioned. An inquiry was next held at Bideford by an Inspector of Fisheries, and the only opposition came from a gentleman who is not a resident in the district. In spite, however, of the fact that the men's demand was supported by the Conservators and everybody locally interested in the fisheries, the Board has now refused to sanction the proposed alteration of the by-law. It is difficult to believe that a Board in London can be better judges of the manner in which the fisheries should be worked than the authorities and the public on the spot, and the almost inevitable result of this will be that some at least of the men will become breakers of what is generally considered an unnecessary and unjust by-law.

With reference to the recent distraint for income-tax at Exeter in the case of Mr. Hems, a correspondent writes:—

> No doubt Mr. Hems did not think it worth while to appeal against the surveyor's assessment, for most district commissioners are appointed from that worthy clan, the county magistracy, whose knowledge of taxes is as exiguous as their knowledge of law, and they are consequently pulled by the tail by the attendant surveyor. These surveyors are, as a rule, sent out from London young, zealous, and pushful, and their stay in a district is generally limited to three years, when a new expert of the same type tries his hand on the taxpayers.
> It is the apathy and meekness of the taxpayers that is to be blamed for the extortion that goes on. In Russia, I am told, they have to use the knout; but nothing more is needed in this country than a peremptory demand for payment of a tax, and the obsequious taxpayer at once pays it, with nothing more than a grunt.

I may say that I have heard from Mr. Hems myself, in reference to my original remarks upon the case, that he did appeal against the surveyor's assessment, but, of course, without effect. His attitude towards the official extortioner is, therefore, altogether in contrast with that described in the above letter, and it is a pity that his spirit is not more prevalent among income-tax payers. Undoubtedly the strong public feeling against the income-tax is largely due to the abuses connected with its collection, and over-assessment is rendered more galling by the knowledge that so many people are under-assessed, or evade the tax altogether.

The West Ham Guardians have well earned all that they have got—many people will think that they have even earned more. But what we should all like to know is how far the practices that have been brought to light in their case are peculiar to West Ham. In a general way I am a believer in the purity of local government in England; but if the minor local authorities in London are all above reproach in this respect, human nature is better than I have taken it for hitherto.

It is interesting to look at the description of the West Ham convicts: Crump, stationer; Anderson, estate agent; Skinner, tool-maker; Watts, carman and contractor; Hill, printer. Small local tradesmen in a poor district of London may not be by nature of inferior moral fibre to the rest of the community. But they are peculiarly liable to temptation when managing other people's money and affairs. To protect them against such temptation what is needed is an intelligent interest in local affairs on the part of their constituents and neighbours. This rarely or never exists in London, either in rich districts or poor. The majority of ratepayers neither know nor care anything about matters of local administration; and do not even take the trouble to vote at local elections. The result is that small rings work the elections; and once elected, the Guardians, or whatever they may be, work more or less in the dark, and without any censorship of public opinion over their proceedings. The local papers are insignificant, and read by few ratepayers. They, too, are owned by small men, who are more likely than not to be in with the local wirepullers.

That scandals should arise under these conditions is inevitable, and when Londoners wax indignant over a West Ham case, or the recent revelations at Hammersmith in the other end of London, they should remember how much they are themselves to blame for it all. They, too, however, are in some measure the victims of circumstances. The truth is that, owing to its vast size, London is in some measure unsuited for the ordinary forms of local government. The sense of a common local life and interests which creates a local public spirit is wanting, and without it representative government is an artificial sham. That is one of the objections to the borough council system in its present shape, and one of the arguments for placing local affairs more under the supervision of the County Council, which, whether you are a Moderate or a Progressive, is a really representative body, elected on definite issues by big polls, watched by the press, criticised, more or less intelligently, by its constituents, and consequently pretty certain to run straight, whatever mistakes it may make.

A NEEDFUL LESSON.

I wouldn't kick a man who's down;
'Tis not my way; yet glad I am
To see stern Retribution frown
On those whose frauds disgraced West Ham.

For many, who in a private deal,
From sharpers' tricks would shrink averse,
No sense of wrong appear to feel
In pilfering the public's purse.

Too long these vicious views prevail;
High time to thrust them on the shelf;
That's why the lesson sharp I hail Administered by Justice Jelf.

Does not the case of the man Jacobsen, upon which you recently commented, cause you to think over your views upon the subject of imprisonment for debt? There are hundreds of fraudulent tricksters like him in London. How is a judgment creditor to get at them except by means of a committal order—no easy matter to obtain, I can asssure you? If you levy execution upon their goods you find that all their furniture belongs to their wives, and you have the cost of an abortive execution to pay. Their banking accounts are in their wives' names, and every other scrap of property they own. If you can personally serve a judgment summons on them, you may get a committal order, and then they pay, but not till then. . . .

There is a great deal more to the same effect, but it adds nothing to the argument, and my answer to the question is emphatically, No. It is no justification for the imprisonment of thousands of honest debtors that the fear of the same fate causes fraudulent debtors to pay up. According to the last County Court return, 11,405 debtors were imprisoned under County Court orders in 1905. It is incredible that all these people, or any considerable fraction of them, were guilty of fraud; and if they really were, it would knock the bottom out of my correspondent's argument, since his contention is that the fear of imprisonment causes the fraudulent debtor to pay up. The imprisonment of 11,405 debtors in one year is also a sufficient answer to the remark that to obtain a commitment order is "no easy matter"—especially when one sees (Table XII. of the same return) that the number of imprisonments has more than doubled in the last twenty years, and increased by over 3,000 a year in the last ten. The process is not only easy, but is becoming easier.

Imprisonment for debt, though the writer of the above letter seems to appreciate the fact imperfectly, was nominally abolished by Parliament in 1869. Yet we are faced with the fact that there are more people in prison for debt to-day than there were in the good old times of the Fleet and Marshalsea. There is no argument in the above letter, or anywhere else, for the perpetuation of this state of things which did not apply equally to the power which the King's Bench formerly possessed of imprisoning debtors, if necessary for life, until Dickens and others succeeded in abolishing it. And every argument which led to that reform applies with increased force to the state of things which the County Courts have set up, because this has led to the creation of a class of debtors, larger, poorer, and more helpless than that which existed under the old system.

Those who argue about the need of protecting the innocent creditor against the fraudulent debtor forget that no one is compelled to give credit unless he pleases. The crowd of debtors which fills our gaols to-day—at incalculable cost to the public—did not exist fifty years ago, because no one would then have dreamed of giving credit to such people. The credit is only given to-day on the strength of the power of imprisonment, and the huge extent of the social evil which has thus been brought into existence is shown by the fact that in 1905 warrants of commitment were issued against over 146,000 persons, of whom over 11,000 actually went to gaol. If the punishment of rogues who obtain credit by fraud were secured under this system, that fact would be but a small set-off against the existence of the widespread condition of chronic indebtedness throughout the poorest section of the community, with all its incidental evils, which these figures indicate. But as a matter of fact, no such result is secured, and the writer of the above letter goes on to describe the wholesale frauds which are perpetrated on tradesmen under cover of the Married Women's Property Act. A law which provided for the punishment of such frauds, and at the same time put a stop to the system under which people who have no property worth speaking of beyond their weekly wages are enabled to obtain unnecessary credit on the security of their own persons, would be of incalculable benefit to the community, and of great advantage to every tradesman who desires to do a sound and legitimate business.

Talking of Jacobsen, whose case gives rise to the foregoing remarks, I have heard a funny story from one of my readers who knows the man. Jacobsen has a brother who was associated with him for many years in the peculiar line of business he carried on. The brother has been mentioned in Truth, I think, under the name of Jamieson, which they both used. The pair were remarkably alike, so much so that it was often difficult to distinguish one from the other—a fact of which they sometimes took advantage. They used to frequent racecourses, and amuse themselves with betting. A bookmaker well-known in his day—the late Charley Head—having suffered from the likeness between the two brothers, after booking a transaction with one of them, surreptitiously marked him on the back with a piece of chalk. He used to congratulate himself afterwards on the success of this precaution.

The Brighton J.P.s have been nominated for a niche in my Legal Pillory on account of a case last week in which a man was summoned for persistent cruelty to his wife, who applied for a separation order. It was alleged that among other acts of cruelty he had struck her on the face with a chisel, tried to strangle her, thrown a lighted paraffin lamp at her, and repeatedly beaten her, blackened her eyes, and knocked her down in the streets as well as in the house. Such a brute clearly deserved condign punishment, and I am not surprised to find that among people unacquainted with the law the fact that the magistrates simply granted the complainant a separation order with an allowance of 7s. a week, and mulcted the defendant in costs, is regarded as a miscarriage of justice. In fairness to the Bench, it is therefore desirable to explain that they did all they were empowered to do on the summons for persistent cruelty which the complainant had chosen to take out in preference to bringing a charge of assault. No fine or sentence of imprisonment can be inflicted under such a summons, the cruelty having to be considered merely in relation to the application for a separation order.

The few warm days last week were responsible for a large increase in the number of vagrants brought before magistrates on sleeping-out charges, and no doubt bearing in mind the recent Home Office circular, magistrates have had no hesitation about inflicting heavy punishments, particularly outrageous examples being afforded by the cases at Ludlow and Swindon. The approach of summer is also heralded by the crop of motor cases due to the setting of police traps, and the Lancaster and Chichester benches have both distinguished themselves by their efforts to supplement county funds by the infliction of heavy fines for purely technical offences. A curious example of muddle-headedness is afforded by the Coventry magistrates in their discrimination regarding the punishment meted out to a man and a woman who were equally engaged in the commission of the offence with which they were charged:—

Coventry City Police-court. Before Messrs. Bethell, Loudon, Caldicott, and Gorton. Lily Timms, charged with indecency. Two months' imprisonment.

Coventry City Police-court. Before the same Bench. John Brandish, charged with aiding and abetting Lily Timms in committing an act of indecency. Fined 10s. and costs.

Lochgelly Police-court. John Foy, charged with assaulting his wife. The woman had two black eyes and her body was covered with bruises. Fined 32s. 6d.

I was "a little previous" in suggesting last week that Tanquerey had worked out the postal circular line of advertising, for I have since heard that there has been a heavy fall of "free portrait" circulars from Paris in certain parts of the country lately. As the venerable—not to say putrid—forgery concocted by Tanquerey as an extract from TRUTH accompanies all these advertisements, I feel it a duty to warn all whom I can against this impudent rascal and all his works—literary or artistic. The provincial papers would be doing a real service to their readers by repeating this warning. Apparently this season of the year is considered a favourable one for this particular swindle, and not in England only. A reader in an out-of-the-way corner of Mexico sends me a specimen of precisely the same circular, done into very choice Spanish, but Tanquerey has apparently not thought it necessary to favour the Mexicans with the extract from TRUTH.

An interesting advertisement with reference to the Viavi business appears in a recent issue of the Rand Daily Mail. It seems that an ex-Viavi lady has secured a large quantity of the remedy at a "Customs seizure-sale," and she advertises that it is to be disposed of at greatly reduced prices. She adds a note in deprecation of rumours circulated by the Viavi Company disparaging the value of her stock, and she explains that at the aforesaid sale the company bid up to £1,425 for the goods which she is now offering, and, after she had outbid them, made an attempt to induce her to sell by private treaty. Taken with the revelations recently noticed in TRUTH, this throws some useful light on the profits of the Viavi trade. The lady in question still wants £3 10s. for a "three months' course" and £12 for twelve months', but if she were offering to give the stuff away, I doubt if it would be worth anybody's while to remove it. It is surely time that people in South Africa, not to mention other places, had their eyes opened to the character of this humbug.

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. Nearly 8,000 convictions last year. Complaints marked "Private," absolutely confidential.—SECRETARY, 105, Jermyn-st., London.

In the last issue of the TRUTH Cautionary List mention is made of the British Electric Institute, 23, Holborn Viaduct, as "proprietors of one of the electric belt flat traps, called the Ajax Dry Cell." I have just heard of the case of a man who has undertaken to purchase one of these articles at the price of five guineas, paying two guineas down, and ten shillings and sixpence a month afterwards. This man had been suffering for eight years from a nervous disease of a serious type, and had been discharged as incurable from the Manchester Infirmary. Needless to say, he derived no benefit whatever from the belt. Equally needless to say, the Ajax people refused to release him from his bargain. If the victim were in a position to incur further expenditure, I should recommend him to sue for the recovery of his money. Anyhow, my advice to him and to all others who are duped in the same way is to refuse further payment when they have satisfied themselves of the worthlessness of the instrument. An expert to whom the belt was submitted in this case observes in regard to it, "the resistance of the human body is about 2,500 ohms, so you will understand the futility of wearing the toy these people have sold you. A bit of string would have been quite as useful, and much cheaper." The same remark applies to the majority of such appliances.

Another business of the same class is carried on by the Magnetic and Health Appliances Company, otherwise the Institute of Natural Therapeutics, of 73, Queen Victoria-street, E.C., under the name of the Odo-Magnetic Treatment. The Odo-Magnetic Treatment is effected by means of "Odo-Magnetic Apparel," in the shape of belts, leggings, knee-caps, and "insoles," or magnetic foot batteries. These articles range in price from 8s. 6d. for the foot batteries, up to £4 for a "gent's belt." I have just heard from a poor fellow who was caught by means of an advertisement in which the Institute of Natural Therapeutics undertook to cure varicose veins by means of magnetic leggings. Apparently when it came to business the victim was persuaded that there were peculiarities about his veins which necessitated the application of more than leggings, for he had, in addition to a pair of these articles for the lower part of his legs, another pair for his thighs, and also a magnetic "body shield." The price asked for the complete magnetic outfit was £6 10s., but, in accordance with the usual practice in all businesses of this class, the customer was allowed to have them at £3 5s., and by easy payments, out of consideration for his pocket. Having put them all on, and worn them, regardless of appearances, for about five weeks, the patient reported that the results were unsatisfactory, but was told to persevere. At the end of nine weeks his varicose veins still resisted the combined effects of the two pairs of leggings and the body shield. I can only repeat for his benefit the advice I have given to the victim of the Ajax Sell.

"Mr. Frank Rickaby, Holly Hall, Dudley," a racing tipster whose flights of fancy I have noticed in past seasons, is in fine form in his latest effusion. "During my time on the Turf," says Mr. Rickaby, "I have amassed A Huge Fortune." No doubt anybody who believes this will also swallow the following statement:—

> I am well in with the leading owners; in fact, I have a joint partnership in some of our greatest thoroughbreds of the day. It is only a small matter for me to run down to Kempton or Sandown Park in my motor and pick up £5,000 in one afternoon. Many of the punters smile when I step into Tattersall's, and rush up to give me a hearty shake of the hand, and their faces light up and fairly beam with joy to see England's greatest racing counsellor and champion punter of the modern age in their midst.

This is only one out of many equally impressive examples of Mr. Rickaby's courage in the handling of the long bow. Viewed as fiction, his account of himself is rather amusing. It is scarcely amusing, however, to reflect that large numbers of people in this country are so devoid of understanding that they actually credit mendacious stuff of this sort, and on the strength of it hand over their money to such sharps as Rickaby.

A member of the same fraternity named Tom King, of Kingsclere House, Hook-road, Epsom, is sending out a booklet containing what is vaguely described as a "press extract," which purports to narrate his romantic career as a sportsman and erstwhile owner of racehorses. It is solemnly asserted that he no longer keeps any horses in training because he "finds his time fully occupied in attending to the requirements of his numerous patrons." It is also represented that his predictions, based on information from sources "you would never find out if you lived to be a hundred," are so consistently successful that when worked on his system—of course, he has a system—"you can't possibly lose." As a "proof" of this, he prints a table of (alleged) results, showing that on a daily investment of £2 in the first month of this season a net profit of £61 would have been made. It evidently never strikes the dupes of Tom King as at all strange that he should be pursuing the disreputable vocation of a touting tipster, importuning all and sundry to forward him half-crowns for wires, when, according to his own veracious story, he could easily pile up a fortune for himself by backing his own selections for his own benefit.

a correspondent remarks that these obscure individuals are not by any means the only similar offenders against the law on the subject. In India, as in England, such lotteries are illegal. Though the law in India is occasionally enforced, however, it is more commonly permitted to remain a dead letter, possibly because many of the officials responsible for its administration are themselves participants in the more or less public gambles which are organised by various clubs. Two of the biggest gambles of the kind are the Derby and the St. Leger sweeps run by the Calcutta Turf Club in the name of the Bengal Club. These sweeps are not club sweeps of the ordinary kind, large numbers of tickets finding their way into the hands of outsiders whose social position is very different to that of the members. My correspondent asserts that the traffic in the tickets among all and sundry is notorious, and these ostensibly private club sweeps have degenerated into a source of serious public demoralisation. It seems to be a scandal that merits the attention of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

Some of the country papers publish the following advertisement:—

VILLIERS, LIMITED,
19, Duke Street, Cardiff,

Dealers in Floor Coverings, etc., are prepared to advance their surplus cash to responsible persons on their promissory note, on life policies, or second mortgage.

No moneylenders' routine.

The managing director of Villiers, Limited, is one Wm. Powell. Until a year or so ago this individual carried on business as a registered moneylender in his own name at the above address. At that time he styled himself an auctioneer and valuer. In an action in the Cardiff County Court, before Judge Owen, Powell was ordered to pay £75 damages and costs for an illegal seizure of furniture belonging to a widow who had been tricked into signing a bill of sale and then handed considerably less than the amount that it had been agreed to advance her. It was shown in that case that Powell charged most exorbitant interest even when he had (or rather supposed that he had, for the bill of sale was eventually held to be invalid) ample security; and in consequence of this exposure of his practices he forthwith registered himself afresh in the alias of "Thomas Picton." Subsequently this bloodsucker seems to have come to the conclusion that he could mask his identity still more effectually by metamorphosing himself into a company, and hence the formation of "Villiers, Limited," to take over the business of "Thomas Picton." To all intents and purposes Wm. Powell is "Villiers, Limited," and the description of the company as "dealers in floor coverings, etc.," is a mere device to trap unwary borrowers into what is really a common usury-shop.

An impudent advertisement, against which all who take an interest in their gardens would do well to be on their guard, has lately been circulated in the name of the Kew Seed Company, Kew Gardens, Kew. I have a copy of it in the shape of a card circulated as an inset in a weekly magazine. It is headed "Fifty thousand pounds in free gifts. To introduce our famous Kew seeds. No money required; we trust you," etc. The point of it is that if you send 6s. to the Kew Seed Co., you will receive "thirty-six fourpenny packets of assorted seeds" at half-price, and any present you may select from a list which will be forwarded to you, including watches, diamond rings, clocks, cutlery, phonographs, and such-like articles used in connection with this sort of catch-penny trade. This is how the £50,000 is to be given away in "free gifts."

The firm who issue this advertisement are the same people who have been several times referred to in TRUTH under the name of the Kew Trading Association. They carry on a cheap-jack business by trick advertising methods, and a particularly delusive type of advertisement in which they dealt was noticed in an article in TRUTH a year and a half ago, when I questioned the contention of the police that the business was not within the reach of the law. The true address of the firm is 14, Victoria-parade, Kew, a small shop in a little street near Kew Gardens Station. The district, of course, is known as "Kew Gardens"; and what the firm have now done is to take advantage of this fact in order to start in the garden-seed line of business, leading unsuspicious people to infer that the address they give is that of the Royal Gardens at Kew. When a firm of this description announces that it is "prepared to give away £50,000 in free gifts," it ought to be understood that this depends on whether the customers are prepared to put them in possession of cash for the purpose. The "free gifts" themselves are, of course, the cheap class of shoddy goods which are sold by this sort of dodges, and the value of the seeds may be judged accordingly.

One of my readers forwards a copy of correspondence which he has had with a firm called Cycledom, Limited, in the Blackfriars-road, on behalf of one of his servants who had undertaken to buy a bicycle on the instalment system. An interesting feature in it is that by way of security the customer, in conjunction with a surety, has to give a joint and several promissory note for the payment of the price. £11 15s. is to be paid in this way—£1 down, and the balance by 12s. a month—for a machine priced in the catalogue at £9 5s. A little exercise in arithmetic will show that this is a rate of interest worthy of the keenest of practitioners in the money-lending business. The customer in this case seems to have made a preliminary payment of 10s., and then thought better of it. On my correspondent's intervention Cycledom, Limited, at first declined to refund the cash, on the ground that they had "been put to considerable expense in this transaction," but kindly offered to supply "lamps, bells, or phonograph sundries" to the value of 10s. However, when reference was made to other measures, they, in their turn, thought better of it, and disgorged 7s. 6d., deducting 2s. 6d. as "part of expenses which we have been put to regarding this matter." The whole of the expense would, of course, have been covered by a few penn'orth of postage stamps.

THE POET AND THE PRINTER.

(An incident of the Whitsuntide holidays

The poet at his table sat,
And scowled with moody frown
To think his pals, both men and gals,
Were all away from town
At blue sea's side, for Whitsuntide,
While he was left behind,
By fate's hard law, and, minus straw,
At metric bricks to grind.

The papers he perused to see
If aught there was to write on;
As blank were they as hunting day
When hounds no fox can light on.
They're filled with stuff that's dull enough
(The usual Whitsun padding)
To make men sleep and angels weep
And their insides feel bad in.

While sat our bard, his forehead scarred
With many a furrowed wrinkle,
In 's ear there rang, with strident clang,
The telephone's tink-tinkle.
"Art there?" "I am—the printer!" "D—n!"
"We're waiting for your copy"—
So now you spy the reason why
These lines read rather sloppy.

Every one is glad to see Mr. Chaplin back again in Parliament. Not only is he personally popular, but among those who do not know him personally—and even those who differ altogether from his opinions—he is universally respected as a man who has always been consistent and honest in his views, and who is quite above the baser tricks and subterfuges of party politics. In the days when Protection was regarded in Disraeli's phrase as "not only dead but damned," Mr. Chaplin adhered loyally to the lost cause; and now that a sort of resurrection has taken place, it is only fitting that he should be among the remnant who still uphold the Protectionist banner at Westminster. But he rather yielded to the intoxication of the moment, if he is correctly reported as having described his return as a crushing blow for the Government. A Government can hardly receive a blow of any kind in an election where there is no Ministerial candidate, and in which the official party organisation, local and central, takes no share.

No doubt, if a Ministerial candidate had contested Wimbledon, Mr. Chaplin would still have been returned by a large majority. The constituency is one of those the verdict of which is a foregone conclusion, and it could only give a crushing blow to anybody by unexpectedly changing its political allegiance. What really is interesting about the election is the fact that it is the first one that has been fought on the issue of Woman Suffrage. The show that their candidate has made on this occasion is hardly calculated to encourage the supporters of that movement. He called himself a Liberal, as do most of the Woman party in the House of Commons. It is to be assumed, however, that he received the support of many Conservatives, for the advocates of woman's rights are pretty well divided between the two political parties.

From this point of view how do the figures come out? Although Mr. Chaplin obtained a record poll, this is clearly attributable to the growth of the constituency in the last twelve months. Over 2,200 voters have been added to the register since the last General Election, and Mr. Chaplin's poll is relatively smaller than that of the Conservative candidate in 1906. His opponent, however, obtained over 4,000 less votes than the Liberal candidate at the General Election, and his poll was only about 500 less than that of the Liberal candidate in 1885, when Liberalism was at high-water mark and this constituency had many thousand less electors than at present. It is therefore obvious that the bulk of the Liberals and nearly all the Conservatives of the constituency refused to vote for a Woman Suffragist; and I have no doubt that the same thing would have happened in an election under similar conditions in almost any constituency in the kingdom. The little gang which is making so much noise at present, and which directs its animosity chiefly against Liberal Ministers, has no followers worth speaking of in the electorate, and those that it has are chiefly Liberals who are on this point at variance with the majority of their party.

There seems to be a growing impression that the experiment of applying the Land Transfer Act of 1897 to the County of London has been a failure. Personally I do not profess to know much about it, but so far as my knowledge goes the facts justify this opinion.

Stephens' Ink writes a clear blue colour which develops into an intense black. It is pleasant to write with and follows the pen ungrudgingly even when much evaporated in the inkstand.

I have received from the town clerk of Kensington a copy of the lengthy report of the sub-committee of the Council of that borough, which has lately investigated the working of the Act. The conclusion of the committee is that the system of compulsory registration of title "has been found to add greatly to the difficulty, expense, delay, and risk of property dealings in London." What it must have added under the head of "expense" is shown by the fact that the fees paid in the seven years that the Act has been in operation amount to £288,928, which is practically in addition to the ordinary costs of transfer; and over and above this £265,000 has been paid out of public money for the upkeep of the new Registry. The system has thus cost upwards of half a million of money in seven years, and the benefits that it has afforded are doubtful, or, at least, "mixed."

This and much more to the same effect has been said before now by those who are personally acquainted with the working of the Act; but it has never been said with quite so much authority, and the time seems to have arrived when the attention of Parliament and the Government should be directed to the question. It is very possible that the circumstances of London are particularly unsuitable for the experiment that has been tried; but inasmuch as property changes hands more frequently in London than anywhere else, the experience of London strongly suggests that the Act is radically defective, wherever it may be applied. This view is borne out by the fact that, although the Act was passed ten years ago, London is the only place in which it has been adopted; and it was only adopted there in opposition to a very extensive and weighty body of opinion. It is pointed out in the Kensington report that in Middlesex and Yorkshire, which have had their own system of land registration for 200 years, the system is much more simple than that of the Act of 1897, and the cost quite insignificant. In Middlesex the registration fees are limited in every case to 5s. I see that on the last occasion when the Act was discussed in Parliament, on a motion condemning the system at work in London, the Liberal Whips told in favour of the motion. The present Government would, therefore, only be acting consistently in ordering now an inquiry into the working of the Act with a view to retracing the mistake that seems to have been made.

No doubt the Imperial Conference has done some useful work, such as can always be found for such meetings to do. But there must be many patriotically disposed people, including all those who are not red-hot politicians, who will feel that any good that may have been done has been dearly bought at the price. Personally, I should think that it would be far better for the Empire that this Conference should be the last, unless the Colonies can find representatives who will not identify themselves with party politics while they are in London, or unless newspapers of the Daily Mail type can be temporarily suppressed as long as the Conference is in the public mind.

The most useful thing that the Conference has done has been to demonstrate, to all who have the sense to see it, the fundamental difficulty which besets every attempt to create artificial ties between a group of self-governing States. For better or worse, our principal colonies have been granted practically unlimited rights of self-government. They have learnt to value these rights, and will tolerate no interference with them. They have no desire—so their representatives say, though their professions hardly accord with their conduct—to interfere with the corresponding rights which we possess, and we on our side could not tolerate any such interference. In such a state of things there can be no common political action except on matters which lie outside the sphere of local self-government, or on matters within that sphere on which all the States are collectively agreed, and on which there is virtual agreement among all parties within each individual State. Directly those limits are overstepped, the right of each State to manage its own affairs without interference from outside is infringed, and what is intended as a bond of union must inevitably become a cause of friction.

This is what has frustrated hitherto all the pious aspirations of those who hanker after "Imperial Federation" in one shape or another. A few years ago the Colonists cold-shouldered all movements in that direction, fearing that they involved a sacrifice of their independence. Now they favour such a movement in one particular shape, obviously because they think it will suit their interests, as no doubt it will. But they have in their turn to face the fact that the proposed scheme may not suit our interests, and that in a matter concerning ourselves we must be the sole judge of our interests, as they are of theirs. After a bitter fight, which is not yet ended, a Government has been installed in office in this country pledged up to the hilt to maintain the policy of free trade. The Colonies at this juncture take the opportunity of moving in the Imperial Conference that we ought to abandon free trade in the interests of the Empire. This means either that we are not the best judges of our own interests, or that if we are right, we ought to subordinate our interests to those of the Colonies, or, as Mr. Chamberlain frankly put it, "make sacrifices" (meaning thereby pay taxes) for the benefit of the Empire.

On any view of it, this doctrine is better calculated to subvert the Empire than to consolidate it. Preached as it has been, its mischievous tendencies have been aggravated. Long before the Conference met, the tag-rag and bobtail of the anti-Ministerial press in this country made it clear that it was to be used as an opportunity of "getting at" the Government, and the game has been carried out to the end with all the resources of cheap newspaper sensationalism. The Colonial Premiers have thus been converted into a party asset and represented for the time being as the leaders of the Opposition in this country. They might themselves have done something to prevent this; but in several instances—Sir Wilfrid Laurier is an honourable exception—they have openly lent themselves to it.

The harm that has been done is not great, because the bulk of the Unionist press, to do it justice, has behaved with restraint and decency. But if this sort of thing is to be repeated every three years, it is bound to have, in course of time, the very worst possible effect. If a British Premier went to Australia or Canada to tell the Colonists what line they ought to take in the interests of the Empire on any question of domestic politics, every one would recognise that he was doing nothing but mischief. We may be more long-suffering than the Colonists in regard to what we ought to take lying down, but the worm will turn sooner or later in England, as in the rest of the world.

THE ARROGANT APE.

The Ape (though why it don't appear)
Thought of himself no Table Beer,
And boasted that whatever Side
With him in Battle was allied
Was bound the other Side to whip,
And smite, like Samson, Thigh and Hip.
  Now he, one Day, while out he strolled,
Met, quite by Chance, the Lion bold,
And, patronising, said: "Well met!
Whither away, my tawny Pet?"
  Dan Lion viewed his swaggering Air
With half-amused, half-scornful Stare.
Then said: "I go to fight the Bear."
  "You do?" the cocky Ape replied,
As visibly he swelled with "Side,"
"Well, I, too, hate old Bruin—dash him!
I'll come along and help you smash him.
Alone, you see, your Chance is quite Uncertain in so stiff a Fight.
But if you've ME to back you up,
Success is sure. What ho, old Pup!"
  The Lion smiled a lazy Smile,
Deeming Rejoinder not worth while,
Then stalked majestic towards the Lair
Where lay his Enemy, the Bear,
The Ape, who wouldn't be denied,
Marching important by his Side.
  They reached the Lair, the Fight began;
But little did the Simian,
Save that he shrieked and howled in Plenty,
And made sufficient Noise for Twenty.
Yet when to Leo's single Strength
His stubborn Foe succumbed, at Length,
Our Ape assumed, with boastful Glee,
The Credit of the Victory,
And vowed that, if he'd not been there,
Success had rested with the Bear.
But Lion smiled a lazy Smile,
Still deeming Answer not worth while.
  Not long thereafter, as it fell,
Another Tale was there to tell,
When he, the Ape, this Time must try on
His Strength, not for, but 'gainst, Dan Lion,
And, with the spotted Pard allied,
Attempt to tame that Monarch's Pride.
  Old Leo grinned to see 'em come;
He said "Fee, Fi!" He said "Fo, Fum!"
Then springing on the Pard he threw him,
And in a Brace of Jiffies slew him,
While Monkey, in acute Alarm,
Swarmed, shrieking, up the nearest Palm.
  But Leo, chuckling in his Breast,
Looked up and thus the Ape addressed:
  "Hi, you, whose Help must needs prevail
To turn to Vict'ry either Scale,
And who, when on my Side you were,
Vowed you, not I, had thrashed the Bear—
How comes it now, my cocksure Card,
Your vaunted Help has failed the Pard?"

SCRUTATOR.

A COMPROMISE WITH JUSTICE.

THE fact that weekly journalists, in common with their printers, are accustomed to take holidays at Whitsuntide, makes it difficult at the moment to enter off-hand upon a detailed discussion of the report of the Home Secretary's Committee on the Edalji case which was published on Saturday. But there are two observations which may be put on record at once. The first is that, from my personal point of view, the report is so far satisfactory that it justifies up to the hilt everything that has been said about the Edalji case in TRUTH during the last three years. When an editor devotes column after column, month after month, to one subject in which only a limited number of people can be expected to take more than a cursory interest, he always has an unpleasant consciousness that he may be boring his readers. If any of my readers have been bored with the Edalji case, I trust that they will now forgive the bore, when they see that he has been fully vindicated by the result, and that his tedious persistency has contributed to the correction in some measure of a gross injustice. The other observation is that from the point of view of Mr. Edalji himself, and from that of the interests of justice, the conclusion now arrived at is extremely unsatisfactory. Mr. Edalji has received a "free pardon"—the only means which the British Constitution provides of officially admitting that he ought never to have been convicted. But he remains under the stigma of having brought his conviction upon himself by conduct not only stupid, but grossly unbecoming to a professional gentleman in his position; and on this ground he is refused that compensation which, as a matter of elementary justice, is due to every man who has been wrongfully convicted of a crime, and doubly due to one who has suffered in consequence a long term of penal servitude, as well as irretrievable damage to his prospects in life. I say irretrievable damage, because a professional man who loses four years of his life at the outset of his career, and is left under a serious imputation at the end of that time, must inevitably be handicapped in consequence throughout his life. Unless, therefore, Mr. Edalji was really guilty of writing the anonymous letters which are now made the pretext of refusing him compensation, justice has not yet been done to him, and until justice has been done, the last word on the Edalji case has not been said.

The reason for this unsatisfactory result will be evident to every one who reads the report of Mr. Gladstone's Committee with full knowledge of the circumstances of the case. The evidence under which Mr. Edalji was committed fell under two distinct heads. There was a certain amount of circumstantial evidence tending to connect the prisoner with the mutilation of a horse; and there were a number of anonymous letters written to the police and other people, prior to the commission of the crime, which suggested that Mr. Edalji was connected with the previous crimes of the same kind which had been occurring for some months, and that he was meditating a further outrage of the same character. The theory of the prosecution was that the prisoner had himself written these letters, though from what motive, unless he were out of his mind, it was difficult for any reasonable person to understand. With regard to the first branch of evidence, Mr. Gladstone's Committee have absolutely endorsed every argument that has been used in these columns, as well as by Sir Conan Doyle and others who have publicly discussed the case. They point out that it rested entirely on the testimony of the police, and that the police had conducted their investigation "not for the purpose of finding out who was the guilty party, but for the purpose of finding evidence against Edalji, who, they were already sure, was the guilty man." I call special attention to the words italicised, because they go to the root of one of the ugliest features in this case. The Committee show, briefly and cogently, that all this evidence was inconclusive, as well as discredited by the bias of the police witnesses, and by contradictions and gaps in their evidence. They conclude, finally, that it is "doubtful whether the jury would have convicted upon the circumstantial evidence alone if they had not been influenced by the case put to them regarding the anonymous or pseudonymous letters." It is, of course, impossible for anybody to say what conclusion any jury might or might not come to upon the evidence submitted to them; but in saying they consider a conviction upon the circumstantial evidence alone would have been "doubtful," the Committee imply that their own opinion is the same as that of everybody who has looked into the case carefully, namely, that this evidence quite failed to establish the prisoner's guilt. At the same time they concur in the general opinion, my own included, that the man would never have been convicted but for the anonymous letters, and the evidence suggesting that he himself wrote them. Thus the anonymous letters become the central feature in the case.

Now, how do the Committee deal with the question of the letters? They point out that two questions arise upon them—first, who wrote them? secondly, what is their value as evidence that Edalji was guilty of the crime for which he was tried? In regard to the first point they say:—

> The issue appears to have been fairly put to the jury whether the letters were written by Edalji or not. The jury had the letters before them, with others for comparison. They had the assistance of an expert witness. They considered their verdict for a considerable time, and we think they must be taken to have held that Edalji was the writer of those letters. We have ourselves carefully examined the letters, and compared them with the admitted writing of Edalji, and we are not prepared to dissent from the finding at which we think the jury arrived.

In regard to the second of these points, however—the significance of the letters, assuming that Edalji wrote them—the Committee point out, what every one can see for himself, that they are quite as consistent with innocence as with guilt. They think it quite likely "that they are the letters of an innocent man, but a wrong-headed and malicious man, indulging in a piece of impish mischief, pretending to know what he may know nothing of, in order to puzzle the police, and increase their difficulties in a very difficult investigation." This is the imputation which is thrown upon Mr. Edalji by this report, concurrently with the finding that he was convicted on insufficient evidence; and this is made the basis for the conclusion that he contributed to his own conviction, on which ground the Home Secretary, in his turn, decides that it is not a case where the prisoner is entitled to compensation.

Now I quite agree, as every one else must, that if Mr. Edalji wrote these letters, being a person of sound mind, he not only has no claim to compensation, but no claim to sympathy of any kind. On that assumption, he is simply a stupid practical joker who has deliberately manufactured evidence against himself for a lark, and got into trouble in consequence. The trouble may have been more serious than he contemplated, but as he has no one but himself to thank for it, no one but himself need be seriously concerned about it. But it has been from the first one of the chief grounds of objection to the man's conviction that the question of the authorship of the anonymous letters has never been properly investigated. By an unfortunate oversight, due to nothing but over-confidence, the prisoner's legal advisers omitted to employ an expert to examine the documents and answer the case for the prosecution upon the question of handwriting. Subsequently to the conviction, every application for permission to inspect the documents on the prisoner's behalf was refused by the Home Office until he came out of prison last autumn. Further, the letters in question are known to have been only one example of a systematic persecution of Mr. Edalji and his family by means of anonymous letter-writing, which had begun many years before the trial; and finally we had in January last a reappearance of the same phenomenon, in the shape of anonymous letters written to Mr. Edalji by some person calling himself "Martin Molton," and professing to have been the author of the previous letters, and to know the author of the cattle-maiming outrages. This extraordinary feature of the case was passed without mention or notice at the trial. In the report of Mr. Gladstone's Committee the anonymous writing prior to 1903 is again unmentioned. The Committee notice the Martin Molton letters of January last, but only to make upon them the non-committal remark: "We think it safer to express no opinion upon their handwriting."

It will be seen from this that there has been no attempt in the latest inquiry to investigate the question of handwriting, which is admittedly the most important question in the case. The Committee confine themselves to saying what anybody who looks at the letters can see, that the resemblance to certain features of the prisoner's handwriting which Mr.

Gurrin pointed out at the trial certainly exist; that the jury had therefore evidence on which they might legitimately conclude that the prisoner wrote the letters submitted to them, and that it cannot now be said that the verdict on this point was unjustified. The Committee cannot be blamed for finding no more than this; it is as much as any tribunal, or any independent critic, could say, until the whole of the letters bearing upon this case from 1893 down to 1907 have been submitted to investigation by a judicial tribunal of some kind, assisted by experts. An investigation of this kind was absolutely essential to any satisfactory solution of the problems surrounding the case; and it is because no such investigation has taken place that the labours of Mr. Gladstone's Committee have failed to yield any satisfactory result and have led to a compromise which is not justice. The question now is whether that compromise is to be allowed to stand.

CONSCRIPTION WITHOUT AN ARMY.

I have received from the secretary of the National Service League, Mr. G. F. Shee, a long letter in reference to recent obsrvations in Truth on the programme of the League, the point of which I think is sufficiently stated in the following extracts:—

Allow me to quote from the National Service League manifesto, so that your readers may see clearly what is proposed therein:—

"What we ask is that the six months' training, laid down by Mr. Haldane as necessary to make the Territorial Force fit for the field, should precede the crisis, and that it should be made compulsory on all able-bodied males of the military age. For the three years subsequent to that in which this training takes place, the men should come up for repetition courses of a fortnight in each year."

From the census of 1901 we find that the annual contingent of lads reaching the age of twenty in any one year is about 380,000. From this total must be deducted:—

For medical ejection and legal exemption	190,000
Required for the Navy, about	15,000
Required for the Army, about	35,000
Required for the Mercantile Marine	18,000
	258,000
Balance to be trained	122,000
	380,000

In round numbers then we have about 120,000 men yearly to be trained, and, as each man would receive training during four years when the scheme was in full swing there would be 480,000 to be trained in one year.

Now Mr. Haldane has shown, in his memorandum of the cost of his Territorial Army, that 312,000 men can be trained for about £2,900,000, and on this basis 480,000 men should be trained at a cost of £4,461,000. But Mr. Haldane's scheme provides only for training for fifteen days, whereas the proposals of the National Service League demand that the first year's recruits should be trained for six months. This involves an extra shilling a day for 120,000 men for 167 days, that is, to make up the difference between a fortnight and six months. This would cost an additional sum of £1,002,000, which, added to the total arrived at before, gives us a total of £5,463,000.

This is in answer to my observations that to give every man in the country a period of training on the Swiss model, and to maintain an organisation under which they will form an efficient army during the period of their liability for service, will cost at least 25 millions a year; and that if this expenditure is to be incurred on a home defence army, it will inevitably involve a corresponding reduction of expenditure on the Navy and the Regular Army. I do not think that the figures which Mr. Shee now gives are of the slightest value. As I have already intimated, I have little confidence in Mr. Haldane's estimate of the cost of the Territorial Army, if the scheme were ever to be carried out in its integrity. But even if the official figures could be accepted, they afford no basis for the further conclusion which Mr. Shee builds upon them. Between the fortnight's training which the Government Bill contemplates, and the six months' training which the National Service League proposes, there is the greatest possible difference. To mention only the biggest point, these 120,000 men can only be kept in barracks if they are to be trained for that time, and the barracks do not exist, but must be provided. The cost does not end, of course, with the mere bill for bricks and mortar. If the £4,461,000 which Mr. Shee arrives at were multiplied by two, I should regard it as a much more likely estimate of the little bill which would be presented to the taxpayer by the time his League's scheme was carried out. Again, I spoke of an organisation under which this force will form an efficient army during its period of liability for service. There is no provision for such organisation in the above calculation. To take only the most obvious point, look at the cost of the staff that must be maintained, if, in addition to 120,000 men undergoing their six months' training, 360,000 more are to come up for a fortnight's "repetition course" every year.

The most astonishing feature about this scheme is the insignificance of the results which it offers. We are to enforce compulsory military training on every man during a period of four years, regardless of the arguments and prejudices against it; we are to incur an additional expenditure of some millions per annum; and all we are to get in return is about 180,000 more men in four years than Mr. Haldane's scheme contemplates, and to have the satisfaction of knowing that they have all completed six months' training in case they are wanted. The only argument that I can see for conscription is that it will make us absolutely safe against being invaded and conquered, and relieve us of the necessity of spending upwards of 30 millions a year upon our Navy. The National Service League scheme will do neither the one thing nor the other, though it may very easily, as I have said before, lead to our falling between the two stools of sea defence and land defence. For conscription in this shape there is absolutely no argument at all. It simply means conscription without an Army—beyond such Army as we possess at present.

There is another passage in Mr. Shee's letter which I suppose I ought to deal with:—

As to your statement that experience tells us that, though compulsory training might be enacted by Parliament, a really efficient army would never be created, I confess I cannot understand it. The experience of Russia, Germany, France, Switzerland, Japan, Italy, and Austria shows that only when compulsion is resorted to are efficient and sufficient forces available for national defence, and what has been accomplished by almost every civilised nation in the world can surely be done by Great Britain. As regards establishing two lines of defence, very few nations require both a strong army and a strong navy, but Japan, which is situated in a very similar position to our own, can, and does, provide a strong army and a strong navy, while Germany has a strong army for the defence of her land frontiers, and is daily preparing a strong navy to protect her mercantile marine.

The point which Mr. Shee cannot understand is a very simple one. It is not a question of what Great Britain can do, but of what Great Britain is likely to do. The countries which he mentions have land frontiers to defend, and powerfully-armed nations on the other side of them. We are surrounded by the sea, and maintain, at gigantic cost, a huge preponderance of naval strength over all other nations, for the purpose of defending it. We consequently lack that incentive for keeping up an efficient army ready to repel attack at any moment, which, as I said in the article which Mr. Shee is answering, "confronts every Continental nation at close quarters." It is for this reason that our home defence forces have always been in a nebulous and inefficient condition, and the argument which Mr. Shee is unable to understand is merely the argument that the cause which has produced this state of things in the past will continue to operate in the future. And common sense suggests that the greater the number of men you enrol for training for home defence, the greater will be the tendency, under pressure of financial exigencies, to maintain them in an inefficient condition and useless to meet any emergency at short notice, because there will always be the delusive paper totals of men under training to mislead the public. The case of Japan presents no analogy to our own case. Japan's army has been deliberately formed, and used, with a view to armed intervention on the continent of Asia to resist the designs of European powers upon China. The case of Germany will be analogous to our own only when the Germans propose to spend 30 millions per annum on their fleet, and put it on an equality with ours. At present their Navy is to them much what our Army is to us—except in point of cost. As long as we are spending annually upon armaments 25 per cent. more than the most heavily armed of foreign powers, there cannot be a shadow of justification for any measure that involves an addition to that expenditure.

DR. TUCKER'S ATOMISER.

Since the paragraph in my issue of March 13, and the article headed "The Atomiser and the Solicitor" in my issue of May 8, I have ascertained that I have unwittingly done an injustice to Mr. Tucker, which I regret. The newspaper report of the inquest shows that the Coroner did not impute fraudulent dealing to Mr. Tucker, but directed his observations to the system under which poor people are led to believe that the Government stamp on patent and proprietary medicines carries with it a guarantee of genuineness. I am told that Mr. Tucker did not see the Lancet paragraph referred to in my article until May 3, and I accept this statement. I also understand that many persons have been benefited by Mr. Tucker's remedy, and I have myself received letters since the paragraph appeared to this effect. I take this opportunity of saying so, and of withdrawing all imputations upon Mr. Tucker or on his solicitor, Mr. Venn, as to whom, I may say, I never intended any imputation.

THE MILITARY TOURNAMENT.

It was originally intended that a more or less realistic representation of a thrilling episode of the Indian Mutiny—the storming and capture of the Kashmir Gate at the siege of Delhi—should form the principal novelty in this year's Royal Naval and Military Tournament at Olympia. When some progress had already been made with the preparations, however, the War Office interdicted the performance, in consequence—so it is said—of the objection of the Secretary of State for India. This interference caused a certain amount of soreness and disappointment, but Mr. Morley's objection—if it really was Mr. Morley's—was not an unreasonable one, especially in view of the unrest that exists in India. Putting aside any question as to its inexpediency, the elimination of this item from the programme does not seem to me to be a matter for regret. Personally, as an old and enthusiastic supporter of the Tournament, I have always regarded the introduction of blood-and-thunder business to split the ears of the groundlings as a rather ugly blot on an otherwise charming entertainment. Officers on the staff of the Tournament have told me that the groundlings like it; but I doubt whether those pantomimic battles with savage foes, which used to wind up the show in the old days at the Agricultural Hall, were really so powerful a draw as was imagined. I have a better opinion of the taste of the shilling visitors than to suppose that they found any particular fascination in the smell of gunpowder, which was the most impressive feature of those performances. Certainly, as the success of last year demonstrated, the Tournament can afford to dispense with any such descent to the cheap devices of transpontine melodrama. However, this is a digression. What I want to point out is that the prohibition of the Indian Mutiny scene naturally placed the managers of the Tournament in an awkward position. But Army men are expected to be able to extricate themselves from awkward positions, and in this instance they did so with flying colours. The officers responsible for the programme at once set to work to fill up the gap that had been made, and by the opening day last week they had got ready a spectacle which ought to prove a bigger attraction than any sham fight the Kashmir Gate could have been.

"Ye Tournament in Ye Olden Days" supplements last year's "Tylting in Tudor Times." That was an exhibition of tilting only, but the tilting was not the only feature of a mediæval tournament. Before the chosen knights entered upon the "solemn joust," the common herd enjoyed their humbler, but more exhilarating, revels and sports, and on the present occasion the latter are represented. On this occasion, too, the popular idea of a mediæval tournament is satisfied by the presence of a Queen of Beauty and her attendants—a circumstance on which Major-General Sir F. W. Stopford, at the luncheon on Wednesday, made the comment that this was the first time in the twenty-eight years' history of these shows that ladies had assisted. Perhaps it was thought that this new departure should be made inconspicuously, or possibly it was deemed undesirable to submit the charms of the Queen of Beauty to too close an inspection, but anyhow, on her remote throne above "the main entrance to the Castle," she is for most of the audience a rather dim and distant vision. Filled with the crowd of retainers and villagers assembled for the tourney, the courtyard of the castle (otherwise the arena) presents a very bright and animated scene. Men and boys play various games; a jester mounted on a mule causes some diversion; there are bouts at quarter-staff and a fight between men on horseback, armed with terrible-looking but quite harmless dummy clubs; two teams have what is described as the mediæval equivalent of a modern tug-of-war, a pole being used instead of a rope; and finally comes a "solemn joust" between the Knight of the White Swan and the Knight of the Red Dragon. "Ye Tournament in Ye Olden Days" is not only a picturesque but a lively and amusing entertainment.

B

There are other items in the programme which, though they have figured in it year after year, are a never-failing source of delight to the public. The musical double ride of the 1st Life Guards is as good as any that has been witnessed at these Tournaments, and that which is to be given on and after Friday by representatives of each of the six Lancer regiments in the service is not likely to show any falling off. A wonderfully dashing and inspiriting musical drive is provided by the "A" Battery, Royal Horse Artillery. Men of the 2nd Life Guards play the diverting game of push-ball on horseback; and the Army Service Corps furnish another exhibition of their smartness in making and striking camp, dismantling their waggons, and putting them together again. In the naval field-gun display, for many years a deservedly popular performance, seamen from the barracks at Portsmouth, Devonport, and the Nore are taking part, and the competition in which the different crews are engaged makes them smarter than ever. A class from the Royal Naval School of Physical Training at Portsmouth contributes a display of exercises based on the Swedish system of physical training, and in the last week of the Tournament a similar display will be given by N.C.O.s from the Army Headquarters Gymnasium at Aldershot. Besides all these things, there are, of course, all the usual competitions, including those for artillery trotting and galloping, and each evening the programme concludes with a military tattoo. It is altogether a capital entertainment, and those who visit it will have the double satisfaction of knowing that they are not only ministering to their own pleasure, but affording much-needed support to a number of naval and military charities. Last year the Tournament raised the handsome sum of £8,000 for those institutions. I trust that this year it will be equally successful.

THE THEATRES.

"The Girls of Gottenberg," at the Gaiety.

A large number of authors' names appear on the programme of the performance at the Gaiety Theatre. Mr. George Edwardes, that popular caterer for pleasure, has reserved power to add to their number, and this is apparent in the book of the words, where, but not elsewhere, a Mr. C. H. Bovill's name appears as the author of the most ingeniously worded lyric of the piece.

> Won't you come and two-step,
> Little girl, with me?
> I can see that you step
> So delightfullee!
> Lightly as a feather,
> Let us go together,
> Putting quite a polish on the parquetrie!

That is the mood exactly in which the public goes to the Gaiety. It wants a two-step or a three-step: something quite simple, done quite nicely by people it knows.

On Wednesday night last I had the pleasure of seeing Miss Gertie Millar do a number of steps in various times and exactly fill the rules of the theatre in that respect, for she is a popular favourite, and will so remain if she stays on the stage till about 1950, when some habitués of the Gaiety may be inclined to say that she shows signs of having lost her pristine youth. In theatrical England it is extraordinary how easily among women and by means of careful advertisements in the illustrated papers and of picture postcards is acquired a reputation. As a matter of fact, the advertised individual has often no physical or other advantage ahead of many others of her contemporaries, save that of having known—Advertisement. This is a generalisation only, and I do not, of course, mean to imply anything against Miss Gertie Millar, who is as distinguished as she is talented. But I am merely providing a gilt frame, into which any one can place a number of different ladies, much starred in the fashion described, and as regards talent: nonentities.

With men it is different, and a reputation is not so easily acquired. Mr. Edmund Payne, for instance, has a great reputation, to which he added much at last week's first performance of "The Girls of Gottenberg," but it is easy to see at a glance that it rests on solid foundations. Mr. Payne is in the first place a humorist; he sees the world in grotesque, and no doubt was the originator of many of the exceedingly funny things he said, and of the yet funnier that he did. The exploding point in laughter with me is low, and it takes a great deal to get me off, but Mr. Edmund Payne did it in the second act of "The Girls of Gottenberg." He has been masquerading as the envoy of the Kaiser, ordering commanders of fortresses to imprison themselves, snubbing High and Mightinesses, and generally comporting himself in the manner of that German tailor who recently hoaxed the German army, and permanently proved himself the greatest humorist in action of our time. This by way of parenthesis, and the precise moment at which I exploded is best reached directly. Mr. Payne, alias Max Moddelkopf, is dining with the Burgomaster's daughter. Enter to them Mr. Nainby and Miss Gertie Millar. Mr. Payne and Mr. Nainby are placed, each with his lady, back to back, and almost touching, in the centre of the vast stage. Mr. Nainby considerably annoys Mr. Payne. The latter endures all for a time, awaiting his opportunity. It arrives with the upsetting of the salt. Mr. Payne remarks: "One should always throw salt over one's left shoulder, to remove the bad luck," and fitting the action to the word, throws a considerable quantity over his shoulder into the right eye of Mr. Nainby. Explosion on the part of Mr. Nainby, then of the audience, explanations between the two, ending in a song and dance.

I have mentioned this little incident as the culminating moment of Mr. Payne's efforts, which certainly deserved the success they achieved. He was admirable as the spurious envoy of the Emperor, and Mr. Nainby came next to him as the sergeant of Hussars, who alone detects the trick, but does not spoil the fun by divulging anything definite. Mr. George Grossmith is a Serene Highness in the play, and its part author. In his song, Otto of Roses, he expresses the Prince's philosophy of life:—

> What oh!
> They know that my heart never closes,
> If you don't like what you've got, oh,
> Pick another from the grotto,
> Is the motto of Otto of Roses.

Among the other songs that hugely delighted the audience, I remember Mitzi's (Miss Millar's) "Rheingold," which was a pretty piping quite dwarfed by Miss de Sousa's vocal efforts, yet quite as great a success with the Gaiety first-night audience. Then Mr. Payne and the Burgomaster's daughter sing a sweet country idyll:—

The lark is out for an airing,
The hawk is out for a lark.

And Mr. Payne combines again with Mitzi to give us the true tale of the amorous sausages.

Of dancing we might with advantage have had more, and I always feel that I never see enough of Miss Kitty Mason, whose brief appearances were the heralds of rapturous encores. Especially she pleased me in the quintet, by force of contrast with two pretty new comers, not by any means her equals as votaresses of Terpsichore. Enough has perhaps been said to show my readers of what kind was the impression the play at the Gaiety made upon me. To sum all up in a word, I should say that it was an excellent example of what one expects to find at the Gaiety. The dresses, the beauty of the human and of the artistic accessories, left nothing to be sought by the imagination. The music of Mr. Ivan Caryll and of Mr. Lionel Monckton was very dancing in its quality, and where one could distinguish the two apart, as in certain of Mr. Monckton's songs, all could realise his especial gift of writing a tuneful and catching air. The present entertainment is far better worth seeing than its predecessor, and I have no doubt that it will prove a success with all, save perhaps with ultra-patriotic Germans, who may find that Mr. Payne makes rather too mad fun of the military hierarchy of their fatherland.

"When Knighthood was in Flower," at the Waldorf.

"By my halidom," quoth Henry VIII. to the future Queen, Mary Tudor, "an thou beest not wed to the King of France by Monday week, I will have thee flogged at Bridewell." "Rubbish!" exclaimed Mary Tudor, as she threw the pearls brought by the French Ambassador into that envoy's face. "Rubbish!" she exclaimed, as she scattered the various coloured silks about the apartment. And "Rubbish!" I was inclined to echo after an hour or so of this unhappy venture of Mr. Sothern and Miss Julia Marlowe.

Rubbish and the phrase in inverted commas at the beginning of these remarks are not precise quotations from the originals. They are placed rather as signposts that may warn the unwary, who are also lovers of historical verisimilitude, that they will not find much to please them in the present production at the Waldorf. The play is adapted by Mr. Paul Kester from a novel, and perhaps in the pages of fiction one may be able to put up with a good deal that seems very absurd on the stage. It seems a pity that Miss Julia Marlowe should have chosen to appear in this production. All her gifts are thrown away in trying to make us interested in the impossible Princess Mary. Mr. Sothern plays the future Duke of Somerset with dignity and quiet composure, and the other characters in the drama are by no means ridiculously filled, if they meant anything in particular. One conception—that of Henry VIII.—seemed to me to open the only door to success. Mr. Mawson, consciously or unconsciously, made the King appear so grotesque that one could not help laughing every time he opened his mouth. Had the other players only done likewise, the evening would have passed amusingly. The beautiful setting of Act I., representing the river landing-place in Windsor Park on May-day, 1513, consoled one to some extent during the first act.

THE COMPLETE CATECHIST.

The Moneylender's Catechism.

(For the use of aspiring West End usurers.)

Question: What are your names?

Answer: Nathan Abrahams Clifford Montmorency.

Q.: Who gave you these names?

A.: My father gave me the two former. The two latter I gave myself.

Q.: What is your profession?

A.: I have no profession. I am a private gentleman with a large capital at immediate command.

Q.: Where do you keep this large capital?

A.: A small fraction of it in the hands of my bankers; the balance of it in my imagination.

Q.: What do you desire to do with the said large capital?

A.: I desire to invest it in sums of from £50 to £50,000 on simple note of hand, without security, at 5 per cent.

Q.: Do you ever vary your rate of interest?

A.: Never. I would scorn to go back on my advertised terms. I only vary the periods on which the interest is calculated.

Q.: Illustrate your answer by an example.

A.: I will. E.g., I charge 5 per cent. per day, per week, per fortnight, or per month, according to the squeezability of the borrower. But it is always 5 per cent.

Q.: What is a borrower?

A.: Borrowers are of two kinds—the eligible and the ineligible.

Q.: Define an eligible borrower.

A.: A confiding or reckless individual, possessing an inalienable income or an absolute reversion, who deals with me personally and signs whatever is put before him without reading it over.

Q.: Define an ineligible borrower.

A.: A meagre and suspicious churl who will sign nothing whatever without first submitting it to his solicitor.

Q.: What is a Bank Clerk?

A.: A young man who will lose his situation if he is found out dealing with me, and may therefore be trusted to pay any demands I choose to make upon him.

Q.: What is a rate collector?

A.: A man who has the handling of large sums of public money, upon which he may be calculated to draw for my benefit, as often as I care to squeeze him.

Q.: What is a note of hand?

A.: That entirely depends upon the borrower with whom I have to deal.

Q.: How do you mean?

A.: I mean that if I am dealing with a country clergyman or unprotected maiden-lady, a note of hand is only a euphemistic name for an unusually stringent Bill of Sale. Whereas if I am dealing with a man who has some knowledge of business, a note of hand is merely a written promise to pay up—which may or may not be fulfilled.

Q.: What is the Register of Moneylenders?

A.: A Register kept at Somerset House in which a grandmotherly Government impertinently insists on my real name, as well as my assumed name and my business address, being inscribed.

Q.: Can you not, however, turn this impertinence to your own advantage?

A.: Happily I can. It enables me to describe myself on my circulars as being "Registered under Government," and so to convey to simple-minded persons the impression that my business has the official imprimatur of Downing-street.

Q.: What is a harsh, oppressive and unconscionable transaction?

A.: A ridiculous legal fiction, under cover of which borrowers are most unfairly given a loophole for evading their just debts.

Q.: What is the Daily Press?

A.: The Agency which prints my prospectuses on its advertisement pages, and at the same time frequently denounces my methods in its editorial columns.

Q.: Who is the Patron Saint of your fraternity?

A.: The late lamented Isaac Gordon.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

BLUE BEARD À LA MAETERLINCK.

IN "Ariane et Barbe Bleue," a lyrical play in three acts, now on at the Opéra Comique, Maeterlinck is more than ever the symbolist. Paul Dukas, the author of the score, tries to convey in it more than music can express; and so he sometimes falls into obscurity. Maeterlinck at first called his work, "La Délivrance Inutile," wishing to teach the uselessness of attempting to deliver souls that do not aspire to be their own deliverers. His dramas are fairy tales, often with a bitter pulp in a tempting rind. The lily-pale damsel, the rude knight, the grim giant, the tricky dwarf who is in the end too many for the steel-clad lord whose sword is ever ready to leap out of its scabbard, the good old dame and noble châtelaine, are so many virtues and vices. With Maeterlinck one lives in a country of allegorical beings. After all, who can say they are not more real than the people we see to-day, and who will to-morrow or the day after only live in our short memories? For my part, I find more reality in the "Faerie Queene" or the "Pilgrim's Progress" than in a whole library of biographies. But is allegory good to set to music when one has not a Gluck or a Wagner, but a Gluck rather than a Wagner, at hand? It certainly is no good to help out the controversy, and in some degree Maeterlinck's long lay is controversial. M. Dukas, the composer of the score, had this drawback to contend against. What could he do when he had to emphasise the abject fears of Blue Beard's five first wives, except fail?

Ariane, the born free woman, is the sixth wife. Blue Beard brought her home a bride after he had rid himself, not as might a Captain Murderer, but a gaoler of the quintette of preceding wives. The internal magnificence of his castle calls for smoked glasses to spare the eye its too dazzling effects. There are more jewels in its adornments than might suffice for the foundations of the New Jerusalem. This is in keeping with the true history of the wife and infant slayer of Tiffanges. He had a revenue of £60,000 a year, which would have been worth seven times as much in our time. His fantastic tastes were luxurious and theatrical, and he did not mind shocking the prejudices of his time in importing gipsies from Spain to dance at a Passion Play on the hill of Calvary. Maeterlinck, in getting up the subject of his lay, read deeply the chroniclers of the fourteenth century. He was struck with the military side of Blue Beard's career, with his companionship in arms with Joan of Arc, and the part he played in her campaign, thus drifting into his sixth marriage with une femme soldat—a free and emancipated amazon.

At the home-bringing of the sixth bride Blue Beard hands her a bunch of five silver keys and a gold key to attach in housewifely fashion to her girdle. Ariane can freely use the silver keys, but not the golden. Why, she asks herself, the interdiction? She is the lawful mistress of the house, and is going to have her own way, quietly and discreetly if possible, and otherwise if she meet with opposition. Curiosity is a noble passion, and the root of all learning. Thus mentally strengthened, Ariane avails herself of an absence of Blue Beard from the castle to go round its chambers and galleries on a tour of independent inspection. She scorns to use the silver keys herself, and directs her nurse to open successively the chambers which serve as treasure rooms. Rich people in Blue Beard's time invested their wealth in jewels and gorgeous vessels of precious metal, of curious workmanship, and bedight with gems. Behind the pile of diamonds in the fifth room Ariane, to the sound of moaning music which seems to threaten storm, espies a golden door. The notion flashes across her brain of the possible connection between this door, the golden key, and the mysterious fate of the five preceding wives. So she unlocks the door, sees a winding staircase in the wall, hears groans de profundis (score in keeping), descends, and in the next act reappears in a dungeon, lamp in hand.

The five wives are there, looking a little like the phantoms in "Robert le Diable," and as if seen through a haze—a fine piece of stage management. On closer inspection they appear emaciated and degraded beings, also a wonderful effect of scenic trickery. The visit of the new wife strikes terror into their abject hearts. Her comforting words, however, pick them up a little. She asks them to tell her briefly, each, her story. They are Selyette, Ygrauine, Melissandre, Bellagine, and Alladine, whom Blue Beard fetched from the far-off East, and who is unable to speak the tongue current in his castle. As Ariane in dumb show tries to teach her to free herself, the lamp goes out, and the emancipatress finds herself imprisoned by darkness. Symbolists will find pleasure in this. Peering about she sees a dim light coming in through a slit in the wall—a loophole, as it turns out, glazed with a dust-covered and cobwebbed pane. She climbs to this narrow window, which she breaks. A flood of pure sunlight pours in, revealing the aged and shrivelled faces of the other wives and their sordid belongings. This revelation shocks them, and they want to be again shrouded in darkness, until Ariane takes them one by one to the loop-hole to point out the flowers, the trees, and the cattle browsing on the mead, and bids them hearken to the songbirds. The music here gives the effects of a concert in an aviary, and is sweet, light, and gleesome. This gives them courage to follow Ariane out of the dungeon into the rooms the silver keys open. The poor creatures fall in love (music scherzando) with the jewels, the silks, satins, and Oriental embroideries, that are stored up. Their deliverer in vain exhorts them to borrow, by a life in the open air, the hues of the rose and lily. They stupidly laugh at her. Alladine, twisting a bright Indian scarf round herself, dances a nautch measure, and then crowds bangles on her arms and ankles. The Christian wives follow her example, and deck themselves out with strings of pearls, rivers of diamonds, earrings, brooches, girdles bright with rubies, emeralds, and other gems. Presently there is the noise as if of a far-off fight, which comes nearer and nearer, and then subsides. Blue Beard enters. All save Ariane cower and run to hide in nooks and corners. She breasts the rising storm. He goes to seize her in a murderous clutch. The peasants whom he thought he had repulsed for good return to storm his castle. He pinions Ariane, and goes out to fight. She calls for help. It comes when Blue Beard is borne back fettered with cords. His captors cut those binding Ariane, and deliver over the monster to her justice. As he is wounded and a prisoner she cuts the cords with his dagger, which she has seized. The other wives, coming out of their holes and corners, take the ultra-sentimental view of their defeated tyrant and lavish on him their caresses. Ariane heaves a deep sigh. She kisses Blue Beard's forehead, not in sign of love, but of forgiveness, and departs to live out her own life in freedom far from the House of Bondage. As she leaves she calls on her sisters to follow. They plead their helplessness. It is the old story of the onions and water-melons of Egypt, but instead of these vegetables there are the jewellery and fine raiment, a shelter over their heads, and a sense of helplessness. May not Blue Beard, in his recent severe lesson, have learned to be kind, and to value mercy?

Not wives only, but nations, have thus acted towards their baulked tyrants.

Those who go to hear Miss Geraldine Farrar as Opera House prima donna will not be disappointed. She ought to rank now as tip-top on the list of American light sopranos. Miss Farrar, who studied under Lily Lehmann at Berlin, is true to her ideal, and gives her best artistic self to her hearers. I dare say that were she singing alone at her piano she would not be less faithful to the inner monitor, and would bring her finest sensibilities to bear upon her notes. She is more pensive, more intellectual, more appreciative, though with infinite grace and naturalness, than soulful. Appreciation is always critical, and holds the scales of judgment, looking at them carefully. It never suffers itself to be intoxicated by any sentiment or passion. Soul does, and, lark-like, warbling aloft in the blue, brims over with joyful, jubilant, adoring admiration of the impalpable firmament around it. There was much of the song bird in Patti, for whom "Romeo and Juliet" was really composed, though she first appeared in it in Paris when her artistic course had nearly run. She was, owing to her birdiness, the ideal Juliet, even then. Miss Farrar's sensibilities are at higher tension. She deals with them as might the most skilled violinist with a Stradivarius. This praise is great, but think it not exaggerated. Her culture is refined, healthy, and extremely varied. When she sang here three years ago for the benefit of some charity, President Loubet, an accomplished musician, said of her: "She might be one of the Graces who had deserted Cytheris for Athens." As to her voice, its ease, sweetness, and flexibility were marvellous. It can be soft as an echo. The brilliant vocalisations, while exciting wonder as tours de force, give the liveliest pleasure by their rare beauty. If not impassioned, they completely lend themselves in the tender, coaxing passages to the part of Juliet. And then the style is ample, and has a nobleness not often to be met with in the light soprano. Krauss had it; but she was a tragedy queen, or rather, the tragic muse lending herself to operatic effects. I do not remember to have heard any Swedish Nightingale who had this quality—the quality of all others which gives the stamp of mastery to an artist.

"Dogs delight to bark and bite." The five days' debate in the Chamber upon the thirteen interpellations, increased to seventeen, went on with terrible barking and biting and canine fury in fighting. If the warfare was not at bottom noble, the great talent on both sides and the eloquence of Jaurès lent it amazing interest as a "match." Jaurès is a big, bulky man, no longer young, and in appearance so vulgar as one might imagine—until one hears him in the tribune—incapable of any telling effect. I hate declamation, mistrust rhetoric, and lose patience with organ-music effects in oratory. A chaste style holds me down and gives me pleasure. Yet some great orators have lifted me out of myself, and among them Gambetta and Jaurès. They both enable me to believe in Orpheus. Gambetta had incomparable themes, full of interest to his hearers. Jaurès has to invent or create those on which he exercises his eloquence. I have often wondered what he might not do if he had, as had Gambetta, themes in which a whole nation was, before he opened his mouth, deliriously interested. He spoke through two days last week, the first day rather diffusely, but the second day with a maestria which the illustrious Burke himself could not have surpassed. It was an indictment against Briand, with whom I generally am, but who, I cannot help seeing, begins to think himself a necessary man, and to kick from him the ladder on which he has climbed.

Briand was indicted for preaching for years what he now wants to put down with a strong hand. This is true. But most politicians who have begun as "the people's friend" incur the same reproach, though not all, perhaps, in the same degree. The lycée education and the debating society destroy in them a proper sense of the meaning of words, or, at any rate, of the meaning attached to them by minds that have not gone through the same verbal course. The French working classes are extremely literal. They take as gospel, until they find out the humbug of it, what is said to them by arrivistes wanting to enter the Town Council of Paris or the Chamber of Deputies. Later Briand over and over again exhorted those who afterwards helped him to descend into the street, appeal to force, draw over the army to their side, and look to direct means for emancipation from the bondage of capital. He was believed and got on. Had he spoken to men of his own culture they would have treated what he said as jolie blague, or complimented him on so cleverly expanding on a rhetorical theme, mighty hard to sustain. Hardly any one thinks of serious fiscal legislation of a liberating character. Since the death of Léon Say Méline tariffs, now fifteen years old, have driven trade from Marseilles. A director of the Nord tells me that they drive it apace from Dunkirk, on which, before and since the voting of the tariffs, endless millions were spent to extend the harbour and the docks. The Western Railway is in distress from the injury Mélinism has done to Dieppe and Havre. Bordeaux is no longer what it used to be, though the fine wines of the Gironde and Libourne enable her to keep her head above water.

The buzz and angry movement all over the South are another consequence of the tariffs which promised the vignerons their foreign markets without having to buy in return of foreigners. In short, the game of the tariffeers was in regard to France as against the rest of the world; heads we win, tails you lose. The exclusion of Spanish wines of the strong, cheap, sweet sorts, good for blending with thin acid French wines, has been the coup de grâce to the Southern vignerons. Nobody will now drink these wines even where they are made. They cannot travel and they do not keep. Horses and oxen it appears like them, and for a short time do better work from drinking them, but pay the penalty in soon breaking down.

Plenty of palliatives have been thought of which Léon Say would have scouted. We have the Caillaux palliative which was tabled at the beginning of last week's long debate. It is making the Government most unpopular, and it is of a piece with those measures which Jaurès threw the other day in Briand's face. The Caillaux palliative aims, perhaps not consciously on the part of Caillaux, at a return to the inquisitorial system of the gabelle tax. The author is a nervous, pleasure-loving man, impatient of contradiction, and, rather curiously, a son of the first Frenchman who took up the Channel Tunnel scheme. The gabelle had lived 500 years when the Revolution swept it off. The Caillaux method could not but revive it or fail to bring about a universal state of espionnage mutuelle.

A PEER AMONG THE PLUTOCRATS.

I WAS rather struck by a paragraph in the papers a day or two back about a Mr. Sobb or Blobb, or some name like that—an American millionaire person—because it proves something I've been thinking for some time past, but nobody else seems to have tumbled to. Mr. Sobb—I am not sure the name wasn't Swab, it is impossible to remember those queer American names exactly—has a house somewhere in Pittsburg, I think, that cost him £800,000, and now he wants to sell it for a tenth of what it cost and go away and live the simple life somewhere, because he says it bores him living like a gentleman. That is what he says—or the ha'penny papers say that he says—but his real reason, I feel pretty certain, is because he has got more brains than most millionaires, and he's found out that millionairism is about played out socially. The truth of the matter is that it's been overdone; there are too many millionaires about nowadays; you couldn't fire an air-gun down Bond-street at any time of day without bowling over four or five of them, and they are just beginning to realise it, the really clever ones, I mean. That is why Mr. Chobb is so anxious to go out of the business, and why the other man spends so much of his money building free libraries faster than books can be printed to put into them. At one time it was rather unusual to be a millionaire; that was about the time when the fashion papers got the idea of the man who could get into any sort of society he liked, no matter how vulgar a beast he was, so long as he didn't object to financing the needy aristocrats who acted as his bear-leaders. That may have been true enough once, when there were, perhaps, only half-a-dozen millionaires on the make, socially, at one time. But it isn't so any more, and hasn't been for some years past. Of course, the ha'penny papers tell you the contrary, and I've no doubt some of them try to believe it, because their proprietors are millionaires, or hope to be, and it's about their only chance of getting anybody to know them. But, as a matter of fact, there are too many millionaires nowadays and too few needy aristocrats to go round. I know at least a dozen families among my own relations who, twenty years ago, were practically penniless, and would have been only too glad of the chance of getting hold of a bonâ-fide millionaire. But by this time they've all married into millionaire families, or else gone in as partners in millionaire firms, or got enough money one way or the other out of their millionaire friends, until they are come to be so many Crœsuses, and can afford to cut the millionaire connection altogether and go in for being exclusive. And this season there are something like a couple of hundred millionaires, home-grown or foreign, who would bid up to almost any price for a needy aristocrat and can't find them for money, let alone for love. To be exact, there are four (needy aristocrats, I mean) left in England. One of them's an aunt of mine; and it is a solemn fact that, since she got back from Biarritz, she has had, directly and indirectly, an average of five applications a day from millionaires, positively praying her to take them under her social wing, and offering her practically anything she likes to ask. She is rather a clever business woman, and she expects to be able to pay off all her own and my uncle's debts and to have something like £10,000 over before the end of the season, and that without definitely taking any of them on. It only shows you what a pitch the thing has come to and why some of the cleverest of them are going out of the business.

Naturally enough, under the circumstances, it has become the proper thing to be poor, or to appear so. I found that out when we were dining with the Fitz-battleaxes on Thursday. Jessie was a bit surprised at them asking us at first because, of course, the stage is just about finished socially, and journalism has scarcely begun. But we found out afterwards that it was because we both work for our living, besides my being notoriously hard-up, so that we are really in the very front of the movement without realisng it. The Sangazure de Vere-Bloggs were expected. Of course, they've been about the oldest blood in England for at least three generations, and they were nearly an hour late. Lady de Vere-Blogg explained that they lived out at Tulse Hill now because rent is cheap there, and there had been a breakdown on the L.C.C. tram system which kept them, because it was too wet to walk, and they couldn't afford to take a hansom. As it happened, the story fell rather flat, because Mrs. Tollemache-Beauvoisin-Phibbs, who was wearing the famous Phibbs emeralds, capped it by pretending that they were only paste and that she'd had to pawn the real ones to pay her rent, and bursting out crying because she couldn't afford to buy better imitations.

Of course, this new movement has really become absolutely necessary, unless Society was to be altogether swamped out by the nouveau-riche element, and, like all really great reforms, it has just grown from the force of circumstances without any one engineering it specially. But it is really an uncommonly good move, because there is no way by which the millionaire person can get round it. The only real existence he's got is because of his money, and in order to get people to realise him at all he has had to boom his money for all it was worth. And now that nobody who wants to be anybody can possibly afford to have a ha'penny to bless himself with, the ground is just cut away from under the plutocrat's feet. Nobody ever would have known him but for his money, and now that he is known to have got money it will only be a fresh reason for not knowing him. So those who have arrived already will find themselves left behind again, and those who haven't will never get the chance of getting there at all.

The Cure of Consumption.—J. Dawson, M.D., L.R.C.S., L.M., testifies as follows:—"I was very glad to see that notice has at length been taken of Dr. Alabone's treatment of phthisis and tubercular disease. From personal observation of more than one case which was pronounced "incurable" by well-known consultants, I can bear testimony to the very great relief and to al disappearance of the disease."—"The Cure of Consumption, Chronic Bronchitis, Asthma, and Catarrh," price 2s. 6d., by E. W. Alabone, Lynton House, Highbury-quadrant, N.

It is only when you understand the real facts about the new movement that you get the key to the way some of the millionaires, especially the Americans, have been going on recently. We hear of a man who spends £10,000 on a dinner party or some tomfoolery of that kind, and we think it is only because he likes vulgar ostentation, or has lost his head or something. Really it's quite the opposite—it's more than a little pathetic if you look at it the right way. The poor devils are trying to pretend that they are ruining themselves, so that they may get a chance of being received in Society after all. The ways they set about it are rather queer, but that's only because they are Americans and only half-civilised. You remember that only a few weeks back one of them committed a murder. All sorts of reasons were suggested by the papers, but the real truth at the bottom of it—or so I believe—was that he knew that a murder trial in America is just about the most expensive luxury any one could undertake. By the time he's finished paying the lawyers and the jury and all the rest of them he'll have got rid of at least a million, I'm told. And then, when the one trial is finished they'll have another trial—they always do in America—and probably half a dozen more on top of that. So, by the time he's acquitted, he'll have been able to get rid of every farthing he's got in the world, and start right off at the very top of the social tree. I could give you dozens of similar instances. There's another man, for instance—about the richest of the lot, I'm told—who has actually set the whole legal machinery of the United States in motion to prosecute himself—for some infraction of the Trust laws, I think it is. He knows perfectly well that if things really become too hot to be pleasant, he can always stop it whenever he likes, because, of course, he can afford to pay well above the current rates for a verdict, but he expects to spend millions before that becomes necessary. And, of course, the free library trick and the paying over of anything that art dealers like to ask for spurious Old Masters are so often done now that nobody thinks anything of them except sub-editors who are at a loss for "copy." But it all comes to the same thing in the end—it has become bad form to be a millionaire nowadays—and whatever the millionaires may think about it, their wives and daughters are determined that they aren't going to let a few millions of dollars stand between them and getting into the most exclusive European society. If you have any money to spare I can tell you an absolutely certain and safe investment for it. Buy up all the small villas in the suburbs that you can lay your hands on. In the next year or two the American millionaires—not to speak of our own aristocracy—will be absolutely tumbling over each other to get them, and the rent will go up to almost anything before they are all suited. Jessie thinks so too.

[Private.—Of course, it wouldn't do for you to ever let any of your readers know it, but there isn't a word of truth in this article. It is really awfully subtle satire. To tell the truth, it seems to me that your fashionable intelligence is a bit dull, if you don't mind my saying so. You only give things that really do happen, and I don't believe the average outsider cares a bit for that. So I've been studying up the fashion articles in the —— (you know which I mean), and I think I've got the hang of them rather well. And, after all, if it isn't exactly true, it's quite as much so as what you read there—six days a week. What?]

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

WE insist, dear Lady Betty, that "money is the root of all evil," and behave as if it were the source of all good.

* * * * *

H—ll is paved with conventionalities.

* * * * *

They are a confusion of inconsistencies that we establish as a middle-course between conscience and convenience.

* * * * *

In England, the women scowl at all, and the men at each other.

* * * * *

It is an excellent country that has this defect; you cannot be happy here if not in "society," and cannot if in "society."

* * * * *

The ordinary man is at home in his own surroundings; the man of the world, in all.

* * * * *

In the London season people do not wish to see each other; they wish to show themselves.

Endeavour to create a good impression in Court; prepossession is nine points of the law.

The citizens of the United States have a curious grievance which has not been ventilated yet on this side of the Atlantic. It is no recommendation whatever in Europe to say of an American that he is clever, polished, amiable, or witty. Of the American woman it must be said that she is beautiful; of the American man, that he is a millionaire—any other description will fail to obtain for either a welcome from their Old-World fellow-creatures.

The American in his own country, however, welcomes a European visitor if the latter is well-connected, or has a reputation in the world of learning, literature, art, politics, industry, or fashion. That is also the course we generally adopt towards visitors from any country but the United States, and that we make the distinction in the latter instance discloses a sentiment of contempt, the existence of which is increasingly irritating to Americans.

* * * * *

Is Germany to be the America of Europe? It is greatly German intelligence, enterprise, and industry, in favourable conditions, that have raised America to the level of prosperity she has attained. Thousands of Germans have made fortunes in the United States and elsewhere, have returned to the Mother Country, and have with their wealth developed her resources and enormously improved her industrial circumstances. The wealth of Germany at the moment is surprisingly great. Rich, well-educated, intelligent, enterprising, industrious, and adapted to American methods, Germany may soon be a European America; a centre of the New in the heart of the Old. That is disconcerting to those who are new-shy.

There is a difficulty ahead that appears to be generally unperceived; most of us in England are becoming richer but the Sovereign! The labourer is earning increasingly higher wages, and is better-conditioned in every respect than were his predecessors. The members of the upper-lower and lower upper-middle classes are obviously improving in their circumstances; those of the upper middle class are attaining great wealth and consideration. There is a decennial increase in the number of our millionaires and multi-millionaires; but the income of the Sovereign remains stationary, though his expenses are almost doubled by the additional requirements of his condition. We are, therefore, apparently in sight of a situation in which there might be a dozen billionaires and a multitude of millionaires who could outshine the Sovereign in splendour, and influence the public, press, and Government with their money. Will the bookmaker then be the king-maker?

The thought leads to another in natural sequence. Throughout history the politicians have allied themselves to, and aggrandised, those who could be of most assistance to them. The crozier was in the ascendant—it was raised to a perilous height. The sword succeeded it—and successful generals became rich and powerful. The pen came next; there was little too good at the time for the satirist, pamphleteer, historian, wit, or poet. Money has replaced them all, the possessor of mere wealth now can obtain the highest titles and positions of great influence in every direction, and has to be considered in all political calculations.

It is a common complaint at the moment that we attend too much to mere wealth, and we throw the blame of this attitude on each other. It is not the public that is mainly responsible for the development, however, but the politicians, who are raising the rich to undeserved heights to obtain their financial support, as the politicians of one period raised the clergy, to get their spiritual support; those of another, the army, to have its physical asistance; and those of another still, the writers, to obtain their literary aid.

The acclimatisation of divorce in England is a matter that may deserve more attention than it is receiving. Until twenty years ago the general attitude of mind in this country as regards divorce was exceptionally severe; the divorced woman was little better than a social outcast, and the divorced man was avoided by many. The influence of America reappears in this direction, for recently our sentiments in this respect have enormously altered. That is the first step towards adapting our divorce customs to those common in some parts of the United States. America is like a huge octopus that has its multitude of tentacles spread over almost all our institutions, characteristics, customs, and methods.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

SPORTING NOTES.

IT would be interesting to hear whether Newmarket has attracted the public in larger numbers during the spring meetings. Various efforts have been made during the last few years to render Newmarket a more popular resort, but they have not been rewarded with any large measure of success. As a matter of fact, the attendance of the general public is no larger than it was in the sixties and in the early seventies, when there were practically no railway facilities. In those days Newmarket was an ideal racing resort. Everybody went everywhere, there being nothing to pay, unless a visitor desired to bet in the old enclosure opposite to the D.M. winning post. The saddling paddock, then known as the birdcage, was open to every one of respectable appearance who cared to enter. Nothing was reserved except the old stand, which was, of course, open only to members. There was never any crowd. Now, however, there are enclosures everywhere, and a visitor desiring to see the racing in comfort of course pays for admission to the stand, and usually buys a ticket for the paddock as well. People are no longer allowed to walk about the Heath as they please. The last part of the R.M. is railed off, so that nobody is to be seen at the spot from which the best view of a race is obtained. Carriages are no longer permitted along the rails, whereas forty years ago there was a line of vehicles four or five deep for nearly half a mile from the winning-post. Visitors are now positively forced into the stands, and people do not care to be thus driven. The Heath all about the stand is now notable for a network of fencing. Newmarket, moreover, is not an accessible place, for the journey from London takes two hours.

The Stewards of the Jockey Club are eager to draw the public to Newmarket, as the spectacle of a thinly filled stand and of half-empty enclosures is not exhilarating, considering the enormous amount of money which has been squandered on the so-called "improvements," which, in the opinion of most people whose judgment is worth a potato-peeling, have been a huge error. In the old days there was no desire to see a crowd at Newmarket. Many members of the Jockey Club (notably Lord George Manners and Mr. Alexander) were furious when the Great Eastern presumed for the first time to run a cheap train from London on the day that Julius won the Cesarewitch. It was suggested to a very popular and highly honoured member (I do not mean Admiral Rous) that the Club fund would benefit if there were a greater number of auction races, with the winners to be sold at small prices, as country horses would thereby be attracted to Newmarket. The proposal was disdainfully dismissed with the reply, "Let them keep their d—d platers for Croydon or Kingsbury, we don't want them here, neither the horses nor their owners."

Last year it was suggested in the press that for the better satisfaction of "the public" all races should finish opposite the stand at the R.M. winning-post. It is most earnestly to be hoped that this most idiotic proposal will receive no consideration from the Stewards. A lot of lazy louts grumble because there are four winning-posts on the flat (the R.M., the Ab.M., the D.M., and the T.Y.C.), so that if any one wishes to witness the finish at three of these a short walk from the stand is necessary. People who take larger views of affairs appreciate, however, the great difference in these courses, as the lie of the ground varies considerably. A horse which will win easily enough on the up-hill finish at the stand may be of no use when the winning-post lies down-hill; while another animal does best over a tolerably flat course. All these are to be found at Newmarket, and there alone, for there is no other course in England which affords any such variety. Any horse's peculiarities can be accommodated on Newmarket Heath, and if it cannot win there it is simply because it is not good enough. There can be no excuse on the score of the course not suiting, if the owner and trainer know their business and place their animals judiciously.

One change at Newmarket would be a most salutary reform. The Second Spring Meeting should be removed from the R.M. to the July course, which ought to be used oftener, and especially as a large sum has lately been expended in extending and improving the stand accommodation. At present the July Course, one of the finest racing tracks in the world, is used on only seven days in the year, while twenty-two days are devoted to the R.M. On the July Course there are also finishes of an entirely different character, as nothing can be more varied than the Exeter Stakes course (which includes the T.Y.C.) and the Bunbury Mile, which is the finish of the Round Course, and which also comprises the Suffolk Stakes Course.

I hope that a rigorous revision of the pecuniary conditions of the Newmarket events of all classes will shortly be taken in hand. Many of the principal stakes could easily be rendered much more attractive to owners without any additional charge on the fund being involved. The conditions of many events are in the highest degree imbecile. In this department of Jockey Club business "the amending hand," which Lord Coke prayed might be "blessed," is urgently needed, and I commend it to the early and careful attention of Lord Durham and Lord Stanley, who will take a practical view of the matter.

The grovelling servility of Newmarket officials and of the racing people there generally towards the Jockey Club is quite comical, especially when contrasted with their singularly offhand demeanour to visitors, and, indeed, to most individuals who are not members, in dealing with whom they quickly conjugate themselves into the imperative mood. I am sure that any member of the Jockey Club accustomed to the slavish deference which he meets with at Newmarket might be pardoned, after leaving that place, for a temporary feeling of mortification near akin to that of Gulliver on his first return from Lilliput, when he warned people to get out of his way for fear he should walk over them.

I hear that Polar Star is not at all likely to start for the Ascot Cup, but that he will probably run at that meeting for the Rous Memorial Stakes, a race which appears a good thing for him, as he has no extra weight to carry. During the week after Ascot Mr. Hall Walker's colt is engaged in the North Derby at Newcastle, a stake which will be worth £1,300 to the winner. Polar Star's penalty of 12 lb. is reduced by a breeding allowance to 9 lb., and the animals left in for this race are a very moderate lot. Mr. Hall Walker has a yearling own brother to Polar Star, and last autumn he sold their dam—Go On, by Isosceles—to Mr. Prentice, for £4,000. The mare has lately foaled a colt by Gallinule, and she has been sent to Desmond. Polar Star has a very nice engagement on August 24, in the Hurst Park Lennox Plate of £1,500 (the winner gets £1,250), and this race is a mere question of health for Mr. Hall Walker's colt, whose 14 lb. penalty is reduced to 5 lb. by a breeding allowance. The race for the Coronation Cup on June 6 will give Polar Star his first opportunity of proving himself to be a flyer, as he will then meet The White Knight, Polymelus, Troutbeck, Beppo, Velocity, and Keystone II. at weight for age. In the autumn Polar Star could meet most of the above-named lot in the Champion Stakes at Newmarket, and also Slieve Gallion and Galvani.

It is the decided opinion of many of the soundest judges at Newmarket that The White Knight will be the best "Cup horse" this year of the lot trained there, and it is expected that he will certainly defeat Polymelus if they meet either at Epsom or at Ascot. The White Knight has improved very much in appearance, and his three-year-old form was excellent, and proved him to be a good stayer. I expect that the finish for the Ascot Cup will lie between The White Knight and the best of the French lot, which will probably be Querido. I hope that Lord Derby will start Bridge of Canny for the Gold Cup, as it would be interesting to see how he gets on with Querido, running at even weights over this severe course. I would confidently expect the French horse to win.

I see it is stated that Ouadi Halfa was bred by M. E. Blanc. The colt was foaled at M. E. Blanc's stud farm near Paris, but the credit of breeding him belongs to Lord Clonmell. Yesterling, the dam of Ouadi Halfa, was in foal to Persimmon when she was sent to France to be covered by Flying Fox. She foaled Ouadi Halfa shortly after her arrival at M. E. Blanc's farm, and, but for the fact of the colt having entered the world in France, he would not be qualified to start for the Prix du Jockey Club, nor could he have taken part in the race for the Poule d'Essai, the stake which he won on May 5. I do not expect that Ouadi Halfa will be seen in England this year. M. E. Blanc's colt cannot have been highly thought of as a yearling, for he was then withdrawn from both the Eclipse Stakes and the Jockey Club Stakes.

I see a reference to the probability of another meeting between Querido and Spearmint in the Ascot Cup. There is not the ghost of the shadow of a chance of Spearmint being in any sort of condition to start for this race. I do not believe that he will ever get through another preparation, and even if he could be trained it is quite on the cards that his excellent form of last summer would be found to have departed. If Spearmint could by any possibility be prepared for a long distance race in the course of the next six weeks I fancy he would "go for" the Princess of Wales' Stakes of £6,000 at the Newmarket First July Meeting. This rich race at present appears to be a certainty for Polymelus, who would have to meet Spearmint at weight for age. Last year's Derby winner is nominated for this race by his breeder, Sir Tatton Sykes.

I hear that Lord Falmouth's dark colt St. Martin, own brother to Quintessence, will represent the Kingsclere stable in the Derby, but his chance will be truly forlorn unless he is vastly superior to Dusty Miller, whose Chester form was beneath contempt. The Duke of Westminster's colt, however, has always been regarded as exceedingly moderate by those who knew most about him. I suppose, in any case, we shall see St. Martin at Ascot, where he is engaged in the Princess of Wales' Stakes and in the Triennial, with a maiden allowance in each race. St. Martin has been left in for the Eclipse Stakes at Sandown Park, and at Goodwood he is engaged in the Sussex Stakes.

The device of entering a valuable horse in a small selling plate, gambling recklessly over the race, and then buying back the animal at an exorbitant price, is very ancient, but it is not a form of sport (?) which long commends itself to even the most hare-brained plungers, as it always turns out disastrously in the long run, for nobody has ever yet been able to play this game at a profit. Even Captain Machell, who in his best days was a past master in the art of placing horses to advantage, found that gambling over selling races did not pay in the long run. The most sensational race on the first day at Newmarket last week was a two-year-old selling plate of £103, the entry for which included Mr. J. B. Joel's Billy Boy, who was entered to be sold for £200, the animal being probably worth quite £2,000 at least. A desperate gamble took place, Billy Boy starting at 6 to 4 in a field of sixteen, and the colt made all the running and won in a canter. He was afterwards bought in for 1,110 gs. Apart from bets, therefore, the owner received £103, and the fund and the owner of the second horse divided nearly £900 between them, this being the amount which Mr. Joel was out of pocket.

There was a very exciting finish for the Newmarket Stakes, which race was generally regarded as a good thing for Linacre, after his prominent running in the Two Thousand. Mr. Clark's colt was generally thought to have been somewhat unfortunate in being beaten by Acclaim as the race was run, but the Duke of Devonshire's colt has greatly improved, and he is very game, so it is a pity that he is not engaged in the Derby. Acclaim was originally entered for the great race, but he was withdrawn when the minor forfeit was declared, and his owner's only representative is Hillsprite. Acclaim's next engagements are at Ascot, where he is entered for the Prince of Wales' Stakes (5 lb. extra), and for the Triennial (10 lb. extra). Acclaim can stay well, and he is entered for the St. Leger. The Newmarket Stakes is the most valuable race which the Duke of Devonshire has won for a long time past, and it was a pity that his Grace and the Duchess were not present to see their horse win, as they are in Ireland. Olympian was supposed to have "come on" since the First Spring Meeting, but he ran very badly indeed, and he is not likely to start for the Derby. Olympian wants time, and long ago, when he was being backed at quite a short price for the Derby, I expressed the opinion that he had not a 100 to 1 chance, for even if Lord Derby's colt had won the Newmarket Stakes in a canter, his prospects at Epsom would not have been improved, as he is altogether unsuited for the peculiarities of the Derby course. Prince of Orange will presumably turn out to be a non-stayer. Linacre is touched in his wind now, and the course was too far for him, especially as the going was very heavy.

Maya's defeat of St. Petersburg in the Payne Stakes proved that her running in the One Thousand must have been all wrong, and it is evident that she can stay well. Neither St. Petersburg nor All Black is likely to be dangerous in the Derby. Mr. Bailey's colt ran badly for the Payne Stakes considering that he had 9 lb. the best of the weights with St. Petersburg.

I have always regarded Galvani as an extravagantly over-rated colt, never having attached the very slightest importance to his defeat of Slieve Gallion in the Middle Park Plate, and I have no belief in his Derby chance. The Clarehaven stable appears to be hopelessly out of form, and if it is true that several of Mr. Gilpin's horses were coughing a few weeks ago, their miserable running is, of course, readily accounted for. If the Derby goes to Newmarket, the winner will be either Bezonian or Wool Winder, and of the pair I would prefer the chance of Colonel Baird's colt, but neither of these animals appears likely to defeat Slieve Gallion.

There will be racing next week at Harpenden, Bath, and Salisbury in the south, and at York and Doncaster in the north. Captain Forester may win the Weston Stakes at Bath with Flitaway, who is half-sister, by Flying Fox, to Ouadi Halfa. She cost 1,500 gs. as a yearling. Lord Harewood's Malwood should run well for the Zetland Stakes at York, and St. Elf may win the Hopeful Stakes at Doncaster, while Mr. L. de Rothschild should win the Fitzwilliam Stakes with Quelpart. The Salisbury Stakes is a certainty for Llangwm if he runs, but the Salisbury Foal Stakes would have been a most interesting race if it had brought out both Pom and Little Flutter. However, Mr. Hall Walker's colt is to be kept for his very much more valuable engagement at Hurst Park on June 14.

I have never entertained a high opinion of the King's dark colt Perambulator, about whom much laudatory trash has been written and jabbered by simpletons who knew nothing whatever about him, but who nevertheless described him as likely to turn out "a second Persimmon." Perambulator was most ignominiously defeated the other day in a gallop over the R.M. trial ground with Coxcomb, Cheverel, and Mores, and the result was the more unsatisfactory inasmuch as his opponents are exceedingly moderate animals. There was no excuse for Perambulator, as he was fairly fit, and he appeared to have progressed in a most satisfactory manner during the last few weeks. Let us hope that the colt may improve later on in the season, but I fear it will take very clever placing to bring him back a winner for even one of his numerous engagements. After the collapse of Victoria in the One Thousand, there does not appear to be the very slightest prospect of his Majesty's colours being carried prominently in any of this year's classic stakes.

A second edition has appeared of Major H. P. Young's "Hints on Horses," published at Bryansford, Leamington. In this little book, which has been warmly commended by many distinguished cavalry officers and other authorities, the author gives in a pithy form a great amount of useful information on almost every point that can arise in connection with the management of horses, and also some practical suggestions on the training of polo ponies.

As an instance of sublime impertinence, I doubt if I have ever met anything more striking than the conduct of the Cyclists' Touring Club. I have had occasion to denounce in pretty stringent language the conduct of the council of that club in refusing to grant a committee of inquiry into its methods and management. I have condemned the means it has adopted to burke an inquiry which has been legitimately demanded, and yet I have received a typewritten circular with a card printed "With the secretary's compliments," asking "for the favour of insertion." The circular sets out the alleged advantages of the club, and with it is sent an expensively got up pamphlet entitled, "The C.T.C. at home and abroad. Dedicated to cyclists throughout the world, and issued gratis by the C.T.C." That is the way the members' money is wasted. Now, the C.T.C. says it loses money by its advertisements when the circulation of the journal exceeds 25,000 or 30,000. It was for that reason that the subscription was increased. Of course, it is merely a question of increasing the circulation sufficiently before another increase in subscription will be demanded. In the interests, therefore, of present members, I can advise no one to join the club. But I go further, and say that no one should join a club whose council has refused access to its books to a committee of inquiry that has been properly appointed. The pamphlet referred to contains the prospectus of the club. In large figures it announces that the membership is approximately 40,000. The figures are underlined. They are meant to catch the public eye. In the petition presented to the Court of Chancery last year it was stated that "the number of members has diminished, and is steadily diminishing, although there are still about 32,600 members." Mr. Kendall Burnett, the chairman, swore that this statement was true. The discrepancy in the figures is so striking that I must warn the public against accepting the figures in the prospectus.

The document I am requested to publish says, "It does not seem to be generally understood that the C.T.C. is now, as ever, devoting its energies to the interests of cyclists." It is very hard lines that the C.T.C. should be so misunderstood; but it really only has itself to blame. It lays itself open to misconstruction. I suppose it was devoting its energies to the interest of cyclists when it wished to throw open its doors to motorists and to give them the advantage of the club funds. It was a quaint expenditure of energy, because the motorists were the very people who have made cycling dangerous, according to the affidavit of Mr. Kendall Burnett. I suppose it is in the interests of cyclists only that the council is devoting so much energy to thwarting and burking inquiry into its financial position. It is with the same object that it employs a chief clerk who assaults a member of the reform party, and who will not apologise, and who is fined.

This attempt of the council to get a cheap advertisement is, I repeat, a piece of gross impertinence. The ways of the club are wasteful and extravagant. The council, for some incomprehensible reason, dreads inquiry into its management. Such an inquiry seems to me to be all the more imperative when it appeals to the public on figures so totally different from those it presented to the Court of Chancery. If the figures in the prospectus are correct, the attempt to get the Court to alter its constitution, on the basis of the other figures, was something worse than a waste of money.

Judging from a recent case, amateur swimming in Manchester seems to be conducted on lines which are calculated to arouse a good deal of friction. The facts of the case are that Lister, an International water-polo player, represents the Hyde Seal swimming club, which belongs to the Manchester and District Water Polo Association. When the players' list was presented to that Association the name of Lister was passed as fulfilling the necessary qualifications, according to the rules, by twenty votes to three. Mr. Baxter, who was President last year of the Amateur Swimming Association, was not present at the meeting, although he was entitled to be there. On his own initiative he lodged a protest with the Northern Counties Association for a breach of rules in allowing Lister to appear as a Hyde player. This seems rather remarkable, and his explanation was that he thought the rules required the protest to be lodged in a certain time. But this was not all that he had done. Lister is employed on the Corporation tram-lines, and some of the men employed have formed a tramway club which is proposing to enter the Association competition at the bottom of the list in junior matches. The Hyde Club is a champion club, and there Lister gets good practice. He has never joined the other club. It appears that Mr. Baxter interviewed Mr. McElvery, the general manager of the trams, and Mr. McMahon, another official, with regard to Lister. He obtained the introduction through Mr. Beattie, the claims clerk to the tram committee. Mr. Beattie is President of the Northern Counties A.S.A. All this came out at the meeting, and other members were naturally furious with Mr. Baxter for lodging the protest, and some considered it very unfair to seek out a man's employers in order to try and compel him to swim for another club. Mr. Baxter said all these introductions were to find out where Lister was stationed. He admitted that he told Lister that he had no doubt that the tramway club would, as the Hyde club did, pay his reasonable expenses of going to competitions. It seems, therefore, perfectly clear that he did in fact try to get Lister to play for the junior club, and it might certainly be that his employers, knowing of the circumstances, would throw in their influence to secure this. At all events, it looks as though Mr. Baxter hoped so. Now, I do not consider such proceedings, however good may be the motive, to be in the interests of sport. There is, according to the newspaper reports I have received, a feeling that certain officials wish to run the sports themselves, without regard to the wishes of the Association. It does seem to me extraordinary that a high official should interfere in the way Mr. Baxter did and should interview a man's employers and say that a junior club would pay his expenses, and follow this up with an official protest when his efforts have failed. If the man was wrongly on the list, that is one thing; to try to get him to play for another club is a different affair, and one entirely unworthy of any one holding a high position in amateur sport.

As the Belgians have decided to come over to Henley Regatta to defend their title to the Grand Challenge Cup, it is as well to know that Leander will put on a good crew. The following have already promised to row: Johnstone, this year's Cambridge president, who is captain, R. V. and E. W. Powell, F. J. Escombe, the University coach, D. C. R. Stuart, Benham, and A. Graham, the old Oxford Blue and another. Stuart will stroke them.

Cambridge opened the cricket season well by beating Lancashire. Payne is in brilliant batting form. M. B. Elderton got rid of six men at the wicket, and Goodwin, with good length leg-breaks, and Lyttelton bowled admirably. Essex scored an easy win over Sussex, but the fielding was not quite up to the mark. Yorkshire had to go all the way to beat Gloucester. Rhodes can still bowl. Surrey continue to mop up unconsidered trifles. They have another Cambridge man playing for them—a bowler named Hitch. Northampton are doing very badly. Kent had some practice at their expense. Worcester scored their first victory against Yorkshire. A splendid innings by Palairet could not save Somerset against Kent, who played in championship form. Surrey are still undefeated, and Crawford is becoming the Jackson of the team. The batting was very interesting on both sides in the Hants and Middlesex match. Litteljohn will, I hope, play regularly.

Mr. W. Meredith Butler's "Golfer's Manual" (T. Werner Laurie, price 2s. 6d. net) is yet another addition to the library of books that have been written for the guidance and instruction of beginners at the game. It has the merit of conveying sound, practical advice with extreme lucidity, and the manual can be studied with interest and advantage, not only by beginners at the game, but by many who, though no longer beginners, play it with more zest than skill. Dr. Macnamara, M.P., contributes an introduction, in which he relates how Mr. Butler first brought him under the fascination of the game, of which he is now a devotee.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

PRACTISING for the Tourist Trophy race in the Isle of Man is now in progress, and a week to-morrow (Thursday) the race will be run. As most interested in such matters will be aware, in addition to the original Tourist Trophy race for light cars, another for heavier vehicles has been organised this year. Originally the two races were to have been held on different days, but it has since been decided to run both on May 29. Of the two, the old original "T.T." for lighter cars has attracted the larger entry, though neither has been patronised to the extent expected and desired by some. For both races special cars must be designed and constructed, and most makers apparently think that they can lay out their money more advantageously than in this fashion. Yet there is no denying that the test involved is a very stiff and searching one, and I do not know that from the standpoint of the average buyer a much better means of advertisement could be obtained. The fact remains, however, that the trade as a whole appears to view the matter differently, so that the entries for the Tourist Trophy race this year are only thirty, as against nearly fifty last year, while this number includes several cars of the same make entered twice or thrice.

Meanwhile, the craze for that form of advertising which takes the shape of long distance trials continues to rage with unabated vigour. The 40 h.p. Siddeley which recently concluded a little run of 10,003 miles (in the course of which it had only one involuntary stop) has been quickly succeeded by a 45 h.p. six cylinder Hotchkiss, which started on April 29 on a similar jaunt, under the watchful eyes of R.A.C. officials, who have also had a 40 h.p. Rolls-Royce and a 30 h.p. White steam car under their observation. It is to be presumed, of course, that in all of these cases the cars entered are identical with those supplied to the public, though it is not quite easy to see how this can be ensured. A car designed for an endurance trial of this kind might easily be constructed in a manner very different from that considered sufficient in the case of the ordinary commercial article, and the performance of the vehicle would not fail to benefit thereby. In the case of firms of such eminence as those named, no one would suggest, of course, that such a course has been adopted, since it is probably the literal truth that all employ, in their own interests, the finest materials and the best workmanship in the ordinary way. But this is by no means to say that this would always be so, and it is just as well, therefore, that the fact should be borne in mind. To carry absolute conviction, such trials should be run on cars picked haphazard out of the makers' stock by the R.A.C. or some other independent body.

It may well happen that an epoch-making development of automobilism may date from Mr. Brennan's wonderful invention of a means of maintaining the balance of a mono-rail vehicle by the use of gyroscopes. As has been pointed out, the gain in the case of motor-cars built on this principle would be at least as great as in that of vehicles running on rails, if not more so. By the substitution of one track for two, the mechanical gain resulting from the diminished friction would obviously be enormous, while in the matter of design and construction incalculable developments may be expected to result from the application of a principle of so novel and far-reaching a character. On the face of it, too, it would seem equally evident that here may be found at last the long-sought solution of the problem of aerial flight. But concerning these and other aspects of a fascinating discovery we shall all learn more in due course.

With the opening of the touring season motorists are finding themselves confronted once again with the nuisance of the "adhesive cyclist." How any one can find pleasure in pedalling in the wake of a motor-car, getting smothered in its dust, and swallowing all the fumes from its exhaust, is incomprehensible enough; but every motorist has, of course, experienced the annoyance caused by those addicted to this practice—annoyance which may amount to anything from the mere irritation caused by the presence of these uninvited hangers-on sweating away within a couple of feet of the passengers at the back, and possibly endeavouring at times actually to catch hold of the car, up to the serious damage which may result from a sudden stoppage on the part of the car and the cyclist charging, as a consequence, into the back of the vehicle. Yet the nuisance is one by no means easy to deal with, and a really effective method has yet to be devised of shaking off unwelcome companions of this description.

A question of considerable importance to motorists is as to the proper interpretation of the law in so far as it provides that motorists shall sound their horns "whenever necessary." While unnecessary horn-blowing is emphatically to be deprecated, and is usually the mark of the novice (who may be seen at times blowing his horn automatically in any emergency, whether the slightest good is effected thereby or not), neglect to take this precaution is an infinitely more serious fault, and of the two it is certainly better to blow too often than not frequently enough. But there is blowing and blowing, and one judicious blast is all that is necessary in most instances. There is a right way and a wrong way even of blowing a motor-horn. The point to bear in mind is that the horn should be employed as a warning—not as a menace.

At the same time, the notion that the horn could be entirely dispensed with is quite impracticable, and it was odd to find the assertion recently that "its disappearance would tend to increase at once the public safety and the public comfort." Such a statement is demonstrably absurd, since any decently quiet motor-car, running on rubber tyres, could not proceed at a speed of five miles an hour along any frequented thoroughfare without requiring some means of signalling its approach. Every motorist must have experienced the sense of utter helplessness resulting when his horn has become temporarily incapacitated, and seriously to suggest that it would be possible to dispense with its use is simply talking nonsense. The general public would be the first to complain if such a suggestion were adopted. The law, as it stands, enforcing the employment of a proper signal, is perfectly well conceived. It is only to its interpretation that exception is sometimes to be taken.

While the duty of the motor-car driver to the general public is constantly insisted on, his obligations as regards his passengers are sometimes overlooked. Yet there is a good deal that might be said on this point. Every one aspiring to drive a motor-car should qualify first as a passenger. This sounds a truism, but in point of fact the practice is seldom followed. As often as not the intending automobilist, having made up his mind to get a car, procures one forthwith, and straightway proceeds to drive it. Nor is there any reason why he should not do this so far as learning the art of driving is concerned.

But previous experience as a passenger is desirable in order that he may learn properly to appreciate the feelings of those who are being driven, which are not necessarily the same as those of the one who drives. The latter, knowing precisely what he can do and what he intends to do, has no tremors; his companions, on the contrary, feel no such assurance, and in too many cases a motor trip becomes a fearful kind of joy for those behind the driver simply because the latter fails to satisfy his passengers that he is driving with due circumspection and discretion. And even the best-intentioned automobilist, who would be astonished to learn the feelings of his companions, is liable to overlook this aspect of the matter unless he has actually had experience as a passenger himself. The ideal driver, in short, will not only drive with what he knows himself to be perfect safety, but will convince his passengers also that he is doing this.

People who sell their cars by auction should take care either to attend the sale themselves or send a representative thereto. A case which occurred not long ago illustrates the desirability of doing this. A car was disposed of in this manner, and the owner was informed that it had fetched such and such a price. Some weeks later the vendor was touring in another part of the country when he recognised the car which he had disposed of, and, getting into conversation with its new possessor, learnt, to his amazement, that the price actually paid for it had been something like £100 more than the sum which the vendor received. It is only necessary to add that the matter was placed in the hands of a solicitor at once, and that the sum in question was handed over without demur. It would, of course, be grossly unfair to suggest that such practices as this are general, but there are black sheep in all callings.

MAMMON.

Ruffled Stock Markets—Sharp Fluctuations in English Rails and Canadian Securities—A City Sensation—Heavy Defalcations by an Influential Firm of Solicitors—Encouraging Monetary News—Indian Gold "Unearmarked."

THE calm in Throgmorton-street was unpleasantly broken last week, markets being subjected to shocks of so violent a character as to remind members of the troubles of March. Home Rails and Canadian Rails were the storm centres, the former being upset by the labour agitation fostered by the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants—a matter with which I have dealt in another column—and the latter being attacked by alarmist cables respecting damage to the crops. The break in these two departments naturally exerted a bad influence all round the House, and for the first three days of the new account the aspect of affairs was distinctly black. Fortunately, a better sentiment supervened before members departed for their Whitsuntide holiday. It gradually began to be recognised that the labour scare at home and the crop scare in regard to Canada had been overdone, and when the "bears" commenced to climb in again, prices, which had fallen to an extent out of keeping with the actual volume of selling, made a ready response. There is no doubt that a factor, in addition to the two mentioned, which had a considerable effect in depressing the market was the default of a firm of solicitors, who had been running a considerable speculative account in the Stock Exchange. The firm in question was among the oldest in the City, and it had acted for one of the most influential finance houses, besides several members of the aristocracy. Estimates of the losses incurred through speculation vary from £60,000 to £90,000, and it appears that the violent break last week in Hudson's Bays and in several other prominent shares was directly due to liquidation connected with this default. The trouble so far as the House is concerned is hardly likely to come to the surface, as it falls upon strong shoulders. It has been common gossip, however, that the Stock Exchange liabilities form only a small proportion of the firm's total defalcations. The episode has created a painful sensation in the City, and, coming as it does on top of several quite recent cases of a similar character, is likely to arouse widespread comment upon the dangers that attend the giving of unrestricted powers in the matter of the investment of money and the holding of securities to solicitors.

A needed tonic for the Stock Exchange was given last Thursday by the notification at the Bank of England that 420,000 sovereigns, hitherto set aside as part of the reserve against the Indian currency note issue, had been set free. The news possesses considerable significance for the Money Market, and seems like the turning point in the course of events for the next few months. During the past week or two the revival of the export demand for gold on Paris account had checked the downward progress of money rates and made some people dubious about a further reduction in the Bank rate. Now, however, that the Indian authorities have commenced to "unearmark" a portion of the huge pile (just over £8,000,000) of the gold they had accumulated at the Bank, the Threadneedle-street authorities ought, with the additional help of further bar gold arrivals from the Cape and elsewhere, and the post-holiday reflux of cash from the provinces, to speedily build up a strong position—sufficiently strong to permit of the Bank rate being lowered within, say, the next three weeks. Further parcels of gold will no doubt be sent back to Paris, but it is from all points of view desirable that the loan advanced us by the Bank of France during the period of stress ruling at the end of last year, should be liquidated as soon as possible. Exactly how much gold will be set free by the India Council it is impossible to say. There is, however, every indication that the demand for currency in the Dependency is slackening, as witness the reduction in the discount rate of the Bank of Bengal last week from 6 to 5 per cent. Some authorities estimate that from £2,000,000 to £3,000,000 will be "unearmarked," and there is nothing unreasonable about the prediction.

The improvement in the monetary situation has caused a moderate rally in Consols, which at one time dipped below the figure of 85—to which the joint stock banks wrote down their holdings a few years ago. The revival was directly due to "bear" covering on the part of one leading House firm. Whether the rally will go much further at present is, perhaps, doubtful, for there is the £5,000,000 Transvaal loan still waiting to be placed without mentioning Jamaica's £1,100,000 and the needs of a number of other important borrowers. At the same time, the general effect of a still further decline in the value of money must tell beneficially upon Stock Exchange securities as a body. In the Foreign Market there has lately been a fair amount of fluctuation in the junior issues of the Peruvian Corporation. A month or two back Perus were tipped all round the House on a report that the Corporation and the Government had come to terms and that an immediate announcement on the subject might be expected. No official communication has yet been made, and, as a consequence, there has lately been a stream of selling on the part of tired "bulls." So far as I can learn, however, the leading holders are not parting with their stocks, and they remain confident that a satisfactory arrangement will be effected before long. As I have previously stated, the idea suggested is a thorough reconstruction of the company's finances, as soon as the settlement has been effected, and the plan will no doubt provide for the redemption of the existing 6 per cent. debentures.

THE RAILWAY LABOUR AGITATION—EXAGGERATED FEARS OF A STRIKE—THE MEN'S IMPOSSIBLE DEMANDS.

The resuscitation of the labour agitation has played sad havoc with Home Railway stocks during the past week, and the reign of passive weakness has given place to active weakness. The talk of a strike frightened a few real holders to play into the hands of the "bears" by throwing overboard their stocks, and practically the only support forthcoming was when the shorts chose to cover themselves. That the present outcry on the part of the men could hardly have come at a more inopportune time nobody with any knowledge of the conditions governing English railways will venture to gainsay. The railway shareholder, indeed, has received nothing but buffetings for the past decade. While gross earnings have, on the whole, shown a fair rate of expansion, the cost of operating, maintaining, and developing the railways has grown at an even faster rate, so that the return on the total capital invested has steadily shrunk, until in 1905 it averaged no more than 3¼ per cent. In other words, out of gross receipts amounting to £113,531,000, the amount distributed in dividends was no more than £15,800,000. Now to grant the demands for a standard eight-hours day and other concessions put forward on behalf of the men would, according to calculations that appeared in the course of an exhaustive survey of the situation by the Railway News, involve an increased expenditure of not less than £7,500,000. This would just about cut dividends in half, reducing the total average return on railway capital to 1⅝ per cent.

This fact alone goes far to demonstrate the impossible character of the claims embodied in what has been styled the "National Programme" of the Amalgamated Society. We often hear talk about the living wage, but the plea of the capitalist to a living return is seldom considered. No doubt most people argue that the capitalist is, or ought to be, able to look after himself. Yet what are the facts surrounding the Home Railway situation at the present time? The great bulk of the money invested in railway stocks represents the hard-earned savings of the middle and thrifty classes of the country, people whose business has brought them into personal touch with the particular railway in which they have staked their money, and who, up to a few years ago, bought railway stocks just as they might buy Consols, regarding them as sound securities which, while not returning much in the way of yield, yet had the advantage of not being liable to the ups and downs common to the securities of foreign countries. If confirmation be needed of the assertion that Home Rails are the investment of the middle-class rather than that of the class which the Hyde Park orator is fond of terming "millionaire bloodsuckers," it is supplied by the announcement made by the chairman of one of our leading railways that 50 per cent. of his shareholders held £500 or less in the concern.

Yet what has been the fate of those who embarked their savings in Home Rails? Concurrently with falling dividends, they have watched the principal grow steadily less, until at the present time the leading stocks stand at the lowest levels touched at any time during the past eighteen to twenty-five years. Throughout this time of adversity holders have manfully stuck to their stocks—it is still mainly true of the British investor that he never parts with Home Rails unless obliged—hoping against hope that the turn in the long lane of depression was about to be reached at last. Surely the case for the shareholders needs no further elaboration. Would any Government incur the grave responsibility that would attach to putting fresh burdens upon the companies? It is not only the question of justice to capital that is at stake. The Government in this case stands as the trustee of the thrifty. Also, there is the question of future railway development to consider. Mr. Lloyd-George, in a recent speech, said that Parliament ought to guard against doing anything that would tend to restrict the flow of capital for use upon necessary railway enterprise. Yet it needs no prophet to declare that any steps taken to force further expenditure upon railway companies will have a very serious effect upon the question of capital raising.

It is hardly to be expected, perhaps, that the bulk of railway employees should fully understand the impossible nature of the claims now put forward on their behalf, but those who profess to lead them suffer from no obscurity of mental vision, and the responsibility that attaches to them is therefore the greater. At the same time, it is worth noting that the Amalgamated Society, despite demonstrations, and the publicity recently given to it by a section of the Press, is still unable to speak for more than a small proportion of the railway men in the country. According to its last issued report, the membership was only 70,130, out of a total force of railway servants engaged in the United Kingdom of 581,000, so that, on the basis of these figures, nearly 90 per cent. of the men take no part in the clamourings of the Union for official recognition by the companies. Trade unionism, indeed, has never flourished in the railway world, and it is not difficult to understand why. The very nature of railway work, on the efficiency of which depends the lives of the public at large, has called forth the exercise of powers by the Board of Trade in the direction of supervising the conditions of employment such as exist in no other sphere of labour. These powers find reflection in the Railway Servants' Hours of Labour Act, 1893, under which, if long hours are persistent in the case of any company, the Board of Trade can not only make complete inquiries, but serve an order upon the offending company, which is enforceable by the Railway and Canal Commission. A return issued last year by the Government throws some instructive light upon the matter of complaints. During thirteen years the average annual number of complaints from the men was sixty-three. In 1905 they were fifty-seven, and in nineteen of this number the Board of Trade found that there was no case against the companies. A total of sixty-three complaints from a total body of nearly 600,000 men is not very formidable, the more especially remembering that the Society does its best to encourage dissatisfaction amongst the men, and the fact that no man with a grievance need be deterred from venting it by the fear of the consequences to himself—all communications of the kind being regarded as confidential.

The conditions of work and remuneration in the railway service, while nobody claims that they are ideal, will, indeed, compare very favourably with other forms of employment. The wages in the various branches of skilled labour are excellent, and where the labour is unskilled the pay is as high, if not higher than most other forms of work that call for no great exercise of skill. There is, too, a catalogue of advantages in the railway service, comprising regular employment, holidays without loss of pay, uniforms, free passes for the employee and his family, free cottages and land, sick pay funds, and old age pensions (without mentioning "tips"), which all have to be reckoned with when considering the matter of remuneration. Granted that in some instances the hours are long, but these must be considered in relation to the character of the work performed. In many instances the actual labour performed is by no means arduous, and where hours are nominally longest the work is of the lightest description. That there is no lack of men ready to enter the railway service is borne out by the statement made in February by the chairman of the Great Western, that in the course of 1906 his company alone had 19,285 applicants for vacancies on the staff over and above the number of hands actually required. From all points of view, then, it is hard to believe that the men seriously mean to attempt to force the hand of their employers, and I can only hope that the talk of a strike is nothing more than the expression of a needless fear. The various boards have at all times been quite ready to turn a sympathetic ear to any grievances uttered by their men direct, and the shrinkage in dividends, to which I have already referred, has been due very largely to concessions voluntarily granted. But railway directors can no more do impossibilities than other men, and the sooner this fact is recognised the better for all parties concerned.

Americans Upset by the Legal Decision Against Mr. Harriman and a Rise in Wheat—Canadian Rails and Crops—Argentine Rails and their Attractive Yields—Leopoldinas and United of Havanas.

The unfavourable news regarding the crops, coloured as it has been by a rise in grain prices, had a bad effect upon American Rails last week, and tended to keep dealings within narrow limits. So far as London is concerned, speculative interest has been almost monopolised by Union Pacific issues. These shares at the outset were bid up on the understanding that arrangements for the underwriting of the $75,000,000 bond issue had been completed, but later in the week the market suffered a fresh shock from the publication of a document containing the recommendations of the lawyers acting for the Inter-State Commerce Commission in connection with the investigation of the Harriman companies. After reviewing the evidence that was given at the inquiry, the attorneys of the Commission find that railroad competition has been suppressed in an area equal to one-third of that of the United States, and that the contracts between the Union Pacific and Rock Island Railroads for the control of the Alton Railroad, as well as the contract between the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific Railroads, and the steps which were taken to secure the control of the Illinois Central and San Pedro Railroads, violated the Anti-Trust Law. They recommend the Attorney-General to institute proceedings to annul these agreements, and further advocate the enactment of effective laws to prevent the inflation of securities. They declare that the profits of the great railroads of the West have been used to buy control of the systems of the East instead of to build railroads for the development of the West as they should have been. This, of course, is not the complete finding of the Commission, but only the advice of its counsel. The Commission is, in fact, still investigating certain phases of the matter. The statement suggests that ultimately effective steps to frustrate the community of interest plan will be taken, but it need not be assumed that anything of a final nature will be reached for a long time yet. Probably, as in the case of the Northern Securities Corporation, there will be a long and tedious process of fighting in the Courts, which may take two or three years before the final adjudication of the Supreme Court is given. In addition to the unfavourable crop news, and the adverse legal opinion in the Harriman case, the continued output of new issues has told against the American market; the Chesapeake is mentioned as being among the latest prospective capital raisers. It is enough to give one pause to find that nearly $1,000,000,000 of new securities have been authorised since January 1, and fully $600,000,000 issued.

Canadian Rails last week moved about in lively fashion. At one time the market was very weak, on the statements as to the wheat crop having suffered serious damage from snow and late frosts. Later on, when it was found that the reports had been considerably exaggerated, prices made a natural recovery. In the circumstances Lord Strathcona performed a useful service by promptly publishing a statement showing how the actual position stood. According to the Canadian High Commissioner, who wrote on the 16th inst.:—

> The past winter has been one of exceptional severity, not only in Canada, but also in the rest of the American Continent, as well as in Europe. It is true that, owing partly to the abnormally heavy fall of snow, the spring has been a late one, and the farmers are backward in sowing the wheat crops. This they are now busily engaged in doing, and a Press cable, published to-day, shows that the bulk of the wheat will be sown by the end of this week, and that the weather is favourable. I have before me a recent cable from the Minister of the Interior, in which he estimates, from reports received from reliable sources, that the total acreage under all crops will not be less than last year—the wheat acreage may be reduced by 10 per cent., but this will be made up by other grain. It is, of course, altogether premature to speak of damage to a crop which is only now in the process of being sown, and I may, perhaps, add that the Canadian farmer regards a deep snowfall as giving the promise of a bountiful crop.

There is thus no ground for alarm, and investors in the two leading Canadian Railways would be foolish to throw away their stocks and thereby simply play into the hands of the "bears."

The Foreign Market has remained quite out of favour. Argentine Rails were inclined to give way slightly, traffics in several instances beginning to show the effects of a short maize crop. Now, however, that the ordinary issues have got upon a yield basis of from 5½ to 6 per cent., there does not seem much room for a further fall, especially seeing that there is little chance of dividends being reduced. The B.A. and Pacific and the Great Western, which carry very little maize, continue to show gratifying traffic expansion. The market has yet to learn the terms upon which the Pacific will work its Western neighbour. If, as many people think, it offers a 6 per cent. guarantee, Westerns should be well worth laying hold of, for at the present price the yield would be 5½ per cent. Mexican Rails have held their ground fairly well, but Leopoldinas and Cuban Rails were upset by big traffic decreases due in the first case to comparison with a very heavy take a year ago, and in the second to the fact that the sugar crop was harvested earlier this year than last. As regards Leopoldinas, I see no reason to modify the good opinion I expressed a week ago. United of Havanas are not likely to soar yet awhile, but at anything around par they ought to be worth picking up for investment.

South Africans Depressed—Forced Realisations and "Bear" Selling—The Rhodesian Gold Output for April—West African Revival Not Maintained—Recovery in Broken Hills—Block 14's Largely Increased Profit—Mount Lyell's Satisfactory Showing.

On the whole, conditions in the Mining Markets have been anything but cheerful. Business has been on a very limited scale in most sections, and the general trend of values has been in the downward direction. Although there has not been a large amount of selling in the Kaffir market, and prices have not given way materially, a feeling of depression has prevailed, and it is feared that until the uncertainty as to the labour outlook is removed by a definite statement on the part of the Transvaal Government, business will continue on a comparatively meagre scale. To a certain extent these descriptions are believed to have been affected by realisations in connection with the account of the firm of solicitors mentioned in a previous column, and, in addition, there has apparently been some "bear" selling, but a change for the better in the tone of markets generally would, no doubt, frighten the short interest into covering, for, as I have mentioned before, they are not so venturesome now as they were a year or so ago, when prices stood at a much higher level. The announcement that two ships have already been engaged to take back the Chinese whose contracts expire next month has served as a reminder that it is of immediate importance that a settlement on the labour question should be arrived at. General Botha is now on his way back to the Transvaal, and in the ordinary course it should not be many weeks now before a definite announcement is made. Meanwhile, apparently, those interested in Kaffirs must of necessity continue to exercise patience, hoping for the best on the strength of the repeated assurances of the Transvaal Premier that the new Government recognises the importance of the mining industry, and will study its welfare. The white miners' strike is still dragging on, but it is believed that good will be the ultimate outcome of the trouble.

As regards Rhodesians, attempts have been made to stimulate interest in the shares of the Banket group, but they have not been successful, and Eldorados have dropped back further, so that those who sold on the recent spurt, as I suggested, have reason to be satisfied. Much improvement in this section can hardly be looked for until the feeling as regards Kaffirs becomes more cheerful, although satisfactory influences may not be altogether wanting. of the aggregate gold output of the country for the past month, the return showing that the Rhodesian mines turned out nearly 3,000 oz. more in April than in March, and it will be seen from the following table that the latest figures are the highest since August of last year:—

The recovery in West Africans has not been maintained. The public has not responded to the attempts of the professional element to stimulate outside interest in the market, and consequently the insiders have secured profits, with the result that prices have fallen back. In the event of a further relapse, however, some of the shares, such as Abossos and Taquahs, should be worth picking up by those prepared to take their purchases off the market.

As regards Australian descriptions, a welcome improvement in the Broken Hill list is to be noted. Colonial speculators, who have been quiet of late, have sent over buying orders during the past week, while interest has been stimulated on this side by the largely increased profit reported by the Block 14 Company in respect of the past half-year, the net earnings being £53,000, as against £23,000 for the previous six months. The Block 10 also shows improvement, its profits for the last half-year amounting to £62,000, compared with £53,000 for the six months ended September last, and it is not unnaturally assumed from these results that the other companies are benefiting considerably from the high prices of the metals. In this group I favour Proprietaries and South Blocks.

In the Copper group—which has continued to receive as much attention as any section of the mining markets—a good deal of interest has been displayed in Mount Lyells, consequent upon the announcement of the results for the last half-year. On the strength of the favourable showing made by the figures, the shares scored a further advance, but liquidation from the North caused a relapse. The total distribution announced on Mount Lyells is 3s. 6d. per share (1s. 3d. dividend and 2s. 3d. bonus), which compares with 3s. 3d. for the previous six months, and is in accordance with the best anticipations indulged in by market men. As a result of the increase of no less than £21 per ton in the price obtained for the copper produced in the last half-year, the company's profit was £265,000, an increase of £26,000 on the preceding period, notwithstanding the fact that the quantity of metal produced was 650 tons less. The increase in the amount to be distributed amongst shareholders will only absorb £15,000, so that the carry forward this time will be larger than last. As regards the mining position, the ore reserves estimate is satisfactory both in respect of quantity and grade, the latter being rather better than was stated six months ago, whereas some had feared that it would be lower. The official report also confirms the announcement I was able to make a few weeks ago as to the Mount Lyell Company having decided to erect superphosphate works at Port Adelaide, considerable quantities of that commodity having been sold in South Australia, and the outlook as regards further sales being considered promising.

The Mines of the Barnato Group—Working Costs Reduced and Extraction Improved—Knights and New Primrose Show Chief Expansion in Profits—Mining Prospects Generally Promising.

In accordance with my promise to review the principal mines of the Witwatersrand, I am devoting a portion of my space this week to the companies of the Barnato group, whose annual reports have recently come to hand. Eight of the mines controlled by this well-known Kaffir house are contributors to the Transvaal gold output, and their achievements in the past year are summarised in the subjoined table, the results of the previous period being also shown in order that a better idea may be gained of the character of the latest statistics:—

* Financial year ends August 31. ‡ Five months. † Nine months.

It will be seen that two only—the Ginsberg and New Unified—have proved disappointing, the other six showing improved profits. The expansion is most marked in the case of the New Primrose and the Witwatersrand Gold, generally known as Knight's. A satisfactory feature revealed by the latest reports is that in nearly all cases it has been possible to reduce working costs, the extent of the reduction ranging from nearly 1s. per ton at the Consolidated Langlaagte to 3s. 7d. per ton at the Knight's. The percentage of extraction was also improved upon during 1906. It will be recognised that these are factors of importance not merely in respect of one year's work, but in connection with future earnings, for they enable a lower grade of ore than formerly to be profitably treated, and thus extend the payable career of the properties.

Dealing with the individual companies in alphabetical order, the Consolidated Langlaagte has considerably improved its position. Whereas at the end of 1905 it owed Messrs. Barnato Bros. £21,600, and during the past year it expended about £26,000 on machinery, plant, and buildings, at the end of 1906 it had cash on deposit and in hand amounting to £12,646. Prospects are for still further improvement in the position, providing the labour supply on the Rand is not interfered with to any extent. I gather from the chairman's remarks at the annual meeting that as soon as the directors consider the labour position sufficiently assured they will put before the shareholders proposals for the working of the company's area on a much more extensive scale in order that dividends may be resumed. Meanwhile, consolation is to be found in the fact that instead of the company paying interest on money lent by Messrs. Barnato, as in 1905, it is now receiving interest on funds invested, which helps to meet the payment of £15,000 per annum as interest on its debentures. Moreover, the monthly profits announced so far in respect of the current year are well above the average of the past year.

The Glencairn has been able to rejoin the list of dividend-payers as a result of its operations during 1906. The distribution made was a little one—5 per cent.—but it is the first since 1898, and there is every prospect of the current year's results enabling the directors to make a larger distribution. The Board has had under consideration the question of erecting plant for the treatment of accumulated and current slimes, it being estimated that at the end of 1906 there were over 200,000 tons on the property, and that 5,000 tons are being added monthly. It is believed that the expenditure on this plant would result in increasing the company's profits, and the chairman at the recent meeting said he hoped it would be decided at an early date to put the work in hand.

The Ginsberg's results were anything but good last year. The grade of the ore milled was 2.2 dwts. per ton lower, and, despite a reduction in working costs and a slightly improved extraction, the profit per ton was little more than half that obtained in 1905. It will somewhat relieve shareholders to learn that recent development is stated to have opened up ore of better value in the Ginsberg section of the property, and that it is hoped the values in the lower levels of the Northern section will prove as good as the upper levels in the Ginsberg were. The management has a scheme in hand for bettering the position of the company; it is proposed to repair the mill, add twenty heavy stamps, and add to or alter the other plant as necessary. The estimated expenditure is about £26,685, the money for which will, of necessity, have to be found out of profits, and in addition the company has also to provide funds for shaft sinking on the Northern section. The alterations to plant, it is expected, will take about eight months. The immediate outlook for holders of Ginsberg is, therefore, not very cheerful, but the management says they may be confident that when the alterations to plant are completed the company will resume the payment of regular dividends.

The fact that the New Primrose distributed twice as much money amongst its shareholders in respect of 1906 as it did for 1905 affords good evidence of the nature of this company's results for the past year. Working costs at this mine were reduced by nearly half-a-crown per ton, and a marked improvement in extraction was effected, so that although the average grade of ore was lower, the profit per ton was nearly 2s. higher. The results achieved by the additional plant for treating accumulated slimes, which was brought into operation just before the close of 1905, have fully justified its erection. The chairman, at the annual meeting at the end of March, described the outlook for the company as good, and said he thought that at the next meeting the management would be able to record a maintenance of dividend distributions. On account of last year 45 per cent. in dividends and a bonus of 25 per cent. were paid to shareholders, and on the basis of the dividend alone the shares at the current price yield nearly 17 per cent.

The New Rietfontein in the twelve months ended August last was only able to run an average of 66 stamps owing to the scarcity of unskilled labour. But the full mill of 120 stamps was brought into operation at the end of that period, and the subsequent results (that is, those for the current financial year) are considerably above—practically double—the average of the period covered by the accounts recently presented. Shareholders may therefore reasonably look for further expansion in the rate of dividend, providing the labour supply of the company is not seriously reduced. So far as the mine is concerned, the chairman said at the recent meeting, the records show every promise and security of the continuation of the improvement in profits —"but all is subject to the qualification as to labour." On the basis of the dividends for 1906 the shares yield 11 per cent. at the current market price.

The New Unified Main Reef is the mine of the group which yields the smallest margin of profit; in fact, had not costs been reduced by 1.8 shillings per ton in the past year working would have resulted in a loss instead of a profit, the average grade of the ore having fallen off to a serious extent. The monthly profits for the current year are more than double the average for 1906, but it will take more than twelve months' earnings, even at the recent rate, to free the company from debt.

The Witwatersrand ("Knights") shows the most marked expansion in profits of any of the Barnato companies, its earnings last year being more than double those for the previous year. In addition to the profit from its mining work, as set out in the table above, the company derived £15,234 from interest, rents, and estate revenue, and was able to pay 25 per cent. in dividends for the year. Although the grade of ore treated was somewhat lower the extraction was nearly 10 per cent. better, while working costs, as mentioned above, were considerably reduced, the net result being an increase of 3s. 2d. in profit per ton. Further improvement in profits is shown by the monthly returns for the current year, and the outlook, so far as the mine is concerned, appears excellent. The only uncertain factor is the labour question.

One of the Spiegel Bucket-Shops.

Several notorious bucket-shops have been run by members of the Spiegel family, whose own name, however, is apparently deemed unsuitable for the purpose of such businesses. For instance, Lawrence Spiegel sends out his touting circulars in the character of "A. Lawrence and Co., stock and share dealers," 38, Great St. Helens, E.C., and, as a rule, it is only when litigation ensues from a transaction that his actual patronymic is revealed to a customer. In the Swansea County Court the other day Spiegel brought an action against a local resident under the following circumstances:—Last October the defendant received a circular from "A. Lawrence and Co." advising a purchase of Tanganyikas on "the small margin" of 5s. a share "for a three-monthly account," and explaining that the sum payable as "margin" for 100 shares would be £25. The wording of the circular was obviously intended to convey the idea that the purchaser's liability would be limited to the amount of the "margin," and under that impression the defendant forwarded £25. When a fall in the shares exhausted this cover, he naturally concluded that the transaction was automatically closed, but on the expiration of the three months he had an unwelcome surprise in the shape of a demand from "A. Lawrence and Co." that he should take up 100 Tanganyikas at the price current when the account was opened, or pay a balance of £94 for differences. It was for this £94 that he was now sued by Spiegel, who in cross-examination admitted that during that period of the account he did not buy or own a single Tanganyika share. For the defence evidence was given bearing out the defendant's view as to the purpose and meaning of the "margin," and the jury returned a verdict to the effect that the £25 he paid was the limit of his liability and also that the transaction was a gambling one. Judgment was accordingly given for the defendant with costs—a result which I commend to the attention of anybody else whom "A. Lawrence and Co." may be suing or threatening with an action under similar circumstances. For people who have not yet had any dealings with this firm the moral of the case is equally plain. Continue to avoid them.

A Word with My Readers.

Will my readers please note the fact that the "Insurance Notes" which have hitherto formed a feature of "Mammon" will in future be published under a special heading after this article? Answers to correspondents on the subject of insurance will also be given there instead of being included in "Vigilant's Letter-box." I may add that it will facilitate the work of dealing with the mass of correspondence which reaches Truth Office if readers asking for information or advice on several different subjects will be good enough to write questions relating to insurance on a separate sheet or half-sheet of paper. It would, indeed, be a great convenience if this plan were also adopted in regard to inquiries concerning distinct classes of stocks and shares and other matters. At present many of the letters which

I have to answer contain a jumble of questions about all sorts of things—railways, mines, industrials, bucket-shops, and so on and so forth all in one breath. Now "Vigilant" does his best to answer every reasonable question that is addressed to him. It ought to be recognised, however, that one man could not deal satisfactorily with the whole range of subjects covered in "Mammon" and the "Letter-box." "Vigilant," in fact, has the assistance of colleagues who are experts in their own departments, and the consequence is that when the same communication embraces a varied series of questions—some of them possibly involving special researches or personal inquiries in the City—it becomes a complicated business to sort them out, so that each one may be properly answered. For that reason I am always grateful to those correspondents who are good enough, as some are, to separate mixed inquiries in the manner I have suggested.

New Issue.

Subscriptions are invited by Messrs. J. Henry Schröder and Co. for £1,000,000 of 5 per cent. debenture stock of the Antofagasta (Chili) and Bolivia Railway Company, Limited, at £103 per cent. This stock, which will be repayable at £110 per cent. on January 1, 1940, has a general charge upon the undertaking of the company after the 4 per cent. and 4½ per cent. debenture stocks already issued. The company was formed in 1888 and its lines then consisted of 273 miles of railway, running through some of the most important mineral and nitrate districts of Chili. By the extensions into Bolivia, which were carried out in 1889 and 1892, and the subsequent construction of several branches, the company's lines have been increased to about 640 miles of railway. Other branches are now in course of construction. The net revenue for 1906 was about £380,000. After deducting from this the amount required to provide interest on the 4 per cent. and 4½ per cent. debenture stocks, there remains a balance of about £295,000, while the amount required for interest upon the present issue will be £50,000. The lists will close on or before Friday next.

"Vigilant's" Letter Box.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can I reply by post, and as there seems to be a misunderstanding in the minds of many of my readers, I wish to emphasise the fact that a coupon must be attached to every inquiry. A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the coloured cover of Truth.

2. Six different stocks are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks an additional coupon or coupons (one for every half-a-dozen stocks) must be forwarded. The answering of many of the inquiries I receive necessitates a great deal of careful research, and I shall therefore be compelled henceforth to enforce this regulation. Its necessity will be apparent when I state that some correspondents send lists of 20 or 30 different stocks covering every class and description of Investment.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

4. Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

5. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

6. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

7. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

8. I do not recommend brokers or solicitors.

Government Securities.

G. B., Gravesend.—1 and 2. Keep the two bonds, which are very fair investments. 3. Argentine New Five per Cent. scrip, issued at 97½ and quoted at about ¾ per cent discount, should suit you as an investment for the balance. Constant Reader, Great Portland Street.—I do not look for any material rise yet awhile, but a rally of say a point or two may occur in the course of the present year. T. T.—The Natal bonds are hardly suitable, being so short dated. The Three and a Half per Cent. Inscribed stock would be better. Otherwise, I see no reason to criticise your list.

Savoy Hotel & Restaurant, London.—The most beautiful garden and river view in Europe. The Restaurant of the world. Hotel rooms bright, fresh, and delightfully quiet.

Railways.

Ferns.—The bonds of a new line operating in an undeveloped country must necessarily be regarded as speculative, and until the company has had a chance of showing what it can do the market displays a proper sense of caution in refusing to rush up the price.

Mines.

Grove.—In the circumstances, you may as well keep the shares in hope of a renewal of market activity later on. J. C.—Subscribing more money in respect of this concern must be regarded as a pure speculation. I have returned the documents. Nemo, Glasgow.—The Kaffirs are worth keeping for a better market. The others are very speculative, and not particularly promising at present. Royton.—The shares named are quoted at a premium for a few days, but have gone to a discount. I was not favourably impressed by the particulars issued, as I indicated in my notes a week or two back. Ailsa Craig.—The shares have been depressed in sympathy with others of the group. They seem a hopeful purchase with a view to dividends. Kennedy.—I have not a high opinion of the shares. Montana.—The fall in the value of shares in which the company is interested, and to which you refer, is responsible for the decline.

Mixed.

Cheshire.—1. Keep the stock for a better price, but you need not trouble yourself about dividend prospects yet. 2. In Canada. At the recent meeting the chairman foreshadowed a further dividend before the beginning of July. The shares are not a very attractive speculative investment. 3. Speculative; the conditions of the trade have not been satisfactory. 4 and 5. Both hopeful purchases. Avoid any dealings with the circularising firm you mention. Artex.—You have made three good suggestions. United States Steel Five per Cent. Mortgage bonds and Atchison New Five per Cent. Convertible bonds are two others that should suit. Spread the money over the lot. Solent.—1. You could obtain 5 per cent. on very good security by exchanging into United States Steel Corporation Five per Cent. Second Mortgage bonds. It would be a pity to part with No. 2. Tyke.—They are all four sound investments, and by spreading your money over the lot you ought not to come to much harm. Bobs.—The new Three and a Half per Cent. stock of the London County Council should suit you. The stock is quite safe, and you can sell at any time. The bank you name is an institution of the first rank. Cradock.—The bonds are quoted at 23½. Surrey.—1 and 2 are good commercial investments, but I should not recommend No. 3. Of the mining shares, Broken Hill Props. would be best for your purpose, the company's position being strong. Somerset.—1. A fair commercial holding. 2. The concern is believed to have decent prospects, and the productive stage is close at hand. 3 and 4. They are purely local concerns. Felstead.—1. Understood to be safe, but why not invest in something gilt-edged in this country? 2. It will be a long time before the project is completed, and I do not consider the possibilities are very great. 3. I am unable to advise. 4. Highly speculative, and I should take advantage of a recovery to realise. Leodensian.—Your first question will be answered in "Insurance Notes." As regards the mining concern, prospects are not bright. I cannot say whether there will be much of a market in the shares. Corbeau.—1. You will have seen that last year the company did not even earn its debenture interest in full; but its prospects for the present year seem to be somewhat better. 2. Should be held. 3. There does not appear to be much likelihood of a recovery. 4. Hold for the present. It is, of course, impossible to say what form the Government scheme will take. 5. The stock is one of the soundest in the list, and should be held as an investment, but the general outlook for the market is so uncertain that I should not care to predict any material rise yet awhile.

Miscellaneous.

Inquirer.—They may ultimately be established on a higher basis if the increased dividend foreshadowed is realised. Anglo-American Breweries.—Various circumstances have combined against the undertaking. It is doubtful whether the syndicate suggested would do much good. Perhaps it might be best to realise and put the proceeds into something more hopeful. Clachnacuddin.—Better face the loss. Bos.—Little information is obtainable concerning the concern. They are highly speculative. W. R. F.—1, 2, 4, 5, 6, and 12 are the best of the list. Of course you must recognise that with a high yield the security is not by any means gilt-edged. Aida.—Except for No. 3, they are a very poor collection, and you could do much better. Kest Even.—As a high-yielding commercial investment they are attractive. I have had no occasion to criticise the concern named, but see Rule 8. Anxious.—The nitrate shares might be held. The decline is due to some slight delay in reaching the productive stage. 2. Will improve when the long-delayed recovery in the market occurs. Hold. 3. The concern is progressing, and the shares are a fair holding. Sailor.—1 and 2. Yes. 3. I do not think so. 4. It is very doubtful. 5. Not so far as I have been able to trace the quotations. Newcastle and J. P. L.—The society is sound, and in view of the guarantee the debentures are a good investment. Tenax.—The National Share Exchange bucket-shop was dealt with in last week's issue. F. M., Malvern.—Thanks for the circulars; most of them had already been criticised, but I am always glad to receive samples of bucket-shop literature. Rara, Spinner, S. T., S. G., Innocent, W. G. A., L. G. B., Brighton, H. J. W., Satana, Parva, J. T. F., and other correspondents.—I do not undertake to give advice in regard to the merits of different Continental lottery or "premium" bonds, nor do I in any way recommend this form of speculation. I have published constant warnings against the International Securities Syndicate, whose advertisements concerning so-called investments (really gambles) in these bonds are grossly misleading. The prices charged by the syndicate and other touting dealers of the same class are enormously in excess of the current market value of the bonds on the Continental bourses where dealings in such securities are recognised. H. H., Manchester.—Not a bank, but a common moneylending concern, which you should avoid. Rapid.—I believe that in both cases you could successfully plead the Gaming Act. In another column I am dealing with an action brought by A. Lawrence and Co. Mutando.—Arnold and Butler are a cover-snatching bucket-shop firm. Vincent.—I believe both are sound societies. Shamrock.—1. Consult a solicitor. 2. I do not recommend any firm. See Rule 8. Don.—There were adverse criticisms of both concerns some time ago, but I do not think the interest and dividend payments are in any danger in either case. T. H. B.—Not at all promising.

 Owing to the holidays a number of answers to correspondents have to be held over till next week.

Miscellaneous—Hudson's Bays Severe Slump and Prompt Recovery—Allsopp's Advance—Daimlers and Argylls—Fine Cotton Spinners' Increased Dividend.

The sensation of the week in the Miscellaneous market was the severe slump in Hudson's Bays, a drop of ten points to 93 occurring in a couple of days. The collapse was partly attributable to adverse crop reports from Canada, which have since been shown to be premature and misleading; but the chief factor was the forced liquidation in connection with the default of a firm of solicitors, to which reference has been made in another column. However, on the eve of the holidays a sharp recovery set in, and I have no doubt that Bays will soon turn the century again, though at the same time I hardly think that they are likely to get much above it for a long time to come. Another noteworthy movement was a rise of half-a-dozen points or so in Allsopps Three and a Half per Cent. debentures. A very sanguine view is being taken of the prospects of the company under the new management, but it is well to remember that similar hopes have been excited before only to be disappointed, and to my mind a purchase of Allsopps, or, indeed, of almost any Brewery securities just now is indicative of pluck rather than of prudence. Where other Brewery securities have exhibited any change at all it has generally been a change for the worse, the most conspicuous example being that business in Ind, Coope B preference £10 shares was marked as low as 15s. Among Motor shares Daimlers have been in demand, and advances were registered in both the ordinary and the preference shares. It is pretty well known that this concern is doing a vastly bigger trade this year than last, and people in close touch with it predict that the next dividend will be not less than 40 per cent., and probably nearer 50 per cent. The contract that has been secured for the manufacture of the Renard road trains is expected to be very profitable, and the Daimler Company has also just completed exhaustive trials with a new motor-'bus, which in some quarters is looked upon as the 'bus of the future. It certainly possesses one great advantage if, as is said, it is practically noiseless. The company's strong position is obvious when it is considered that it has a reserve, invested in land and works, of about £500,000, whereas its total issued capital, when the £100,000 of new 6 per cent. preference shares are placed, will be only £300,000. The recent set-back in the price of the shares was due to a good deal of ragged buying when they stood around 7½, but the weak "bulls" have now cleared out, and Daimlers look ripe for an improvement. Another motor company which is doing remarkably well is the Argyll. With the recent dividend warrants the directors sent out a circular giving the shareholders information as to the position and prospects of the business. According to this the sales for the six winter months exceeded the record figures of the corresponding period of last year by nearly 30 per cent., while, since the spring commenced, the ratio of increase over last year has been even greater.

In the textile group little activity has been displayed, and the most interesting event has been the publication of the report for the year ended March 31 of the Fine Cotton Spinners' and Doublers' Association. The dividend on the ordinary shares for the past year is 10 per cent., the highest the company has yet paid. Including £15,507 brought in, the profit amounted to £839,343, which was nearly double that of the previous year. The reserve has been increased by £150,000 to a total of £850,459, and the substantial balance of £114,343 is carried forward. The figures in this report are certainly a striking proof of the extraordinary prosperity of the textile trade, which so far shows no sign of falling off. The present price of the ordinary shares of the company, which last year were as low as 22s. 6d., is 34s. At the meeting of the British Tea Table Company the chairman intimated that—as was anticipated in this column last week—a scheme for the reduction of the capital would be necessary. The suggestion was received with manifest disfavour, and the chairman's explanation of the causes of the present unfortunate position of the company was also regarded as unsatisfactory, a committee of investigation being eventually appointed. It may yet be possible to pull the concern round to some extent, but the outlook for the shareholders is decidedly discouraging. In other catering companies' shares hardly any alterations have been recorded. Lyons', which in my judgment are the most attractive of any of them, stand at a price which affords a return of about 5½ per cent. Among meat shares Eastman's had a slight gain on the strength of the scheme for the splitting of the preference and ordinary £10 shares into £1 shares, which will give them a wider market. Nelson's, now at about 20s. 6d., are quite inactive. VIGILANT.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

The annual meeting was held on Wednesday last at the Cannon-street Hotel, Mr. Owen Philipps, M.P., presiding.

The Chairman, having pointed out that the accounts were presented on that occasion in a slightly modified form, said that the figures for 1906, for the fourth year in succession, showed an improvement. It might not be so great as some proprietors might have hoped for, but the advance not only in gross earnings, but also in net revenue, had been steady and continuous, and, although the shipping trade was always liable to fluctuation, the prospect for the holders of the ordinary stock was brighter now than it had been for many years. The cost of bunker coals in 1906 was higher per ton than in 1905, but he was pleased to say that they had made some very favourable contracts for a large quantity of Welsh coal at considerably lower prices than those now current. The question of making proper provision for depreciation was of the utmost importance; and the directors had set aside £173,000 for that purpose, as compared with £141,000 in respect of the previous year. They were able, out of the available balance, to recommend the payment of 5 per cent. on the preference stock; in future the dividend on the preference shares would be paid half-yearly. The year before he became chairman the company not only passed the ordinary dividend, but also showed a loss on the trading. This was the fifth year that they had been unable to pay an ordinary dividend, but, if all went well, the directors hoped to be able to pay a dividend on the ordinary stock—of which, he mentioned, he was a considerable holder—at the end of the current year. He then referred to his visit on the company's business to South America, and remarked that the difficulty that shipowners had to contend with, both in Brazil and the Argentine, was that the shipping trade had increased much quicker than the facilities of the ports; but the Government of both countries appeared anxious to do all that was possible to relieve the present congestion of traffic at all ports. There had been a general revival of trade in Australia, and the Australian Government seemed desirous of doing everything in their power to increase the number of white immigrants, provided they were of a suitable class. He was of opinion that the great and fertile country of Australia only required to be better known in order to attract a much larger population. Referring to the company's West Indian main line service, he said that notwithstanding the fact that the last Government withdrew their mail subsidy of £81,500 a year, the company had been able to retain their hold on the trade. It had been very uphill work, and they had only been able to achieve success by persistent efforts and by continuing the voyages of their main line steamers from Jamaica to New York. If they were to go on employing high-class passenger steamers on their main line service to Barbadoes and Trinidad, it was imperative that the British Government should recognize the great Imperial service which this company had been doing for the Empire for many years past, and more especially during the last two years, in which period they had received the quite inadequate remuneration of £7,000 per annum for carrying the British mails across the Atlantic. A gradual development was taking place in their passenger and cargo trade from England and the Continent to Cuba and Mexico. The question of whether mail subsidies were or were not necessary was probably one about which there would be differences of opinion for many years. It was doubtful if any country gained by paying a subsidy to shipowners except for services actually rendered. If the payment for all mails was based on the poundage of mails actually carried, like any other form of excessively valuable cargo, and if the rate of poundage was settled in each case with some regard to the nature and value of the services performed, he believed that it would in the long run be to the advantage of all concerned. Moreover, if the money saved by the Government was spent in improving and cheapening cable communications, the necessity for very fast mail steamers would disappear, as very fast steamers were not so comfortable for passengers as large steamers of more moderate speed. These remarks about subsidies did not apply to any service which was maintained solely on national and Imperial grounds, and where, as in the intercolonial service in the West Indies, there was no trade to justify any service at all on a commercial basis. Having stated that the board had received more proxies than ever in support of their policy, and that he would never rest satisfied till the company took its right place in the front rank of successful steamship enterprises, he moved the adoption of the report, and the the payment of a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the preference stock.

Mr. Spencer H. Curtis seconded the motion.

Mr. Denny expressed his dissatisfaction with the change which had been made in the form of the accounts, and contended that the proprietors had as great a right as the directors to the fullest information, to enable them to judge whether their shares were worth holding.

The Chairman, in reply, said that he had done his best to raise the company from the position into which it had fallen, and he regretted that Mr. Denny, who was a large proprietor, should have thought it advisable to make the speech that he had made. He thought that the new form of accounts was in the best interests of the stockholders, and, as already said, the board had received greater support than ever before. (Cheers.)

An amendment by Mr. Denny, to the effect that, in future, the working account should be published, was not seconded; and the original motion was then agreed to with one dissentient.

A special general meeting was afterwards held to settle the remuneration to be paid to Mr. Philipps as managing director. After a long discussion, in the course of which an amendment proposed by Sir Joseph Savory (one of the directors) to refer the matter to a committee for further consideration had been negatived, it was resolved, on the motion of Mr. Austen, seconded by Mr. Heald, that the managing director should receive ½ per cent. on the gross receipts in any year when 5 per cent. was paid on the ordinary stock and £3,000 in any year in which 5 per cent. on the ordinary stock was not paid.

INSURANCE NOTES.

How Money is Lost—Good and Bad Policies—Insurance Companies as Trustees and Executors.

THERE are two kinds of loss—the absolute and the relative. A good example of relative loss is afforded by the case of a correspondent, who finds that he has assured to less advantage than he might have done. He took some endowment assurance policies in the Sceptre Life Association, amounting altogether to £3,000, and after paying premiums for six years, and having bonuses of £232 in all added to the sum assured, he desired to surrender the policies for paid-up assurance: that is to say, he was to pay no more premiums, and a reduced amount would be payable on his attaining a given age, or at death if it occurred previously. On making application to the company he was reminded of a very unusual statement contained in the Sceptre prospectus. Having paid one-fifth of the original premiums, the policies for £3,000 could be surrendered for one-fifth of the sum assured, namely, £600. In almost, if not quite, every other company, the bonus of £232 already declared would be added to the £600, so giving a free or paid-up policy of £832. The Sceptre prospectus, however, says that "Free policies will be entitled to a proportionate share of bonuses already added." My unfortunate correspondent, therefore, finds that his bonus of £232 is reduced to £25, and this policy for £625 does not participate in future profits.

Turning to the prospectus of the Clergy Mutual Assurance Society, I find that in similar circumstances they would not only have given him £600 for the surrender of the original policy, together with the full amount of the bonus, but the policy would have continued to share in the profits. The words of the prospectus are: "If the original policy was entitled to participate in profits, any addition thereto by bonus would remain attached, and moreover the fully paid-up policy would share in subsequent divisions of profit." It is worth while to compare the results of this arrangement with those of the Sceptre. If a man of thirty took a policy for £1,000, payable at age sixty or previous death, from the Sceptre, and a similar policy in the Clergy Mutual, he would have to pay £32 10s. 1d. annually to the Clergy Mutual and £33 13s. 4d. to the Sceptre, or an extra of £1 3s. 3d. a year. At the end of six years the sum assured would have been increased by bonuses of £90 in the Sceptre and of £120 in the Clergy Mutual. If now the policy-holder wished to exchange these policies for paid-up assurance, he would obtain about £220 from the Sceptre, as against £320 in the Clergy Mutual. Should the policy-holder survive until age sixty, the Sceptre would only pay him £220, while the Clergy Mutual would have gradually increased the sum assured by a further £96, and would pay the policy-holder £416 on reaching age sixty, instead of £220, which is the amount to be obtained from the Sceptre. Not only are the annual payments lower, but the results to the policy-holder are much better, whether he continues the payment of premiums until the policy becomes a claim, or whether, like my correspondent, he decides to surrender his policy. The letter to which I have been referring also grumbles with good reason at the small amount of the surrender value. In this respect, also, the conditions of the Sceptre are very far from being good, though when my correspondent tells me that another office guarantees a cash surrender value of 75 per cent. of all the premiums paid, I have to remind him that this condition applies to endowment policies, and not to endowment assurances; on this point he is mistaken. He is, however, quite right when he talks of the importance of understanding a prospectus before and not after effecting assurance, and of seeing what other companies can do. The experience of this correspondent is of a kind which is continually being reported to me; people do foolish things, and then come grumbling to me. I am quite glad to receive their grumbles, especially if, as in this case, they are well founded, but if people will only lock the stable door after the steed is stolen it is not possible for me—at least in such cases as this—to help them recover their horse.

A relative loss of this kind is annoying enough, but an absolute loss is in many ways even worse. The best policy may have been taken or the best investments made, but unless the capital is well looked after, all previous efforts are of little use. A lot of people regard a sum of money as a sort of fetish, and think that when this financial fetish is provided, everything will go along quite happily and all right. Of course, capital is only of value for what it yields, and unless the beneficiaries receive an adequate income from the capital, the capital by itself is of comparative little use. The tendency of everybody is to say that his trustees, his executors, and his solicitors are capable and honest, and that the disasters which are continually reported as happening to other people will not happen in his case. To my mind this is a very foolish way of looking at things, especially as there is a simple and effective remedy available. Testators, beneficiaries, and trustees all have reason to disapprove of the prevalent arrangements, and to cordially welcome the appointment of a responsible insurance company to act either alone or in co-operation with relatives and friends as trustees. It seems to me that it is only necessary to contrast the relative merits of individual and of corporate trustees to see the superiority of the latter plan. A testator appoints a friend in whose ability and integrity he has every confidence; the friend may die, or go abroad, or refuse to undertake the duties, and then somebody else has to be appointed, of whom the testator knows nothing, and of whom he might have cordially disapproved. None of these contingencies can arise if the duties are entrusted to an insurance company.

Either with good or bad intentions, an individual trustee may speculate with the trust property, or invest it badly, or may commit a breach of trust which he is unable to make good. In any such case the objects of the testator are defeated. An insurance company is almost of necessity competent and businesslike, and in the improbable event of committing a breach of trust it has ample funds out of which to make good any deficiency.

Whereas an individual may never have acted as a trustee before, and the work be entirely strange to him, it is part of the regular routine of some insurance companies, it is in charge of competent officials and under the control of a board of directors. It is not uncommon for individual trustees to mix up trust monies with their own accounts, and by no means always easy or pleasant for beneficiaries to request and to obtain information, accounts, and inspection of documents. Insurance companies keep separate banking accounts for each trust fund, as a matter of course supply regular accounts, and are always ready to supply information and produce securities.

Many people hesitate to ask their friends to undertake such a thankless task as acting as executor or trustee, and it seems to me that a quite appropriate reply of anybody who is invited to act in this capacity would be to suggest that the task should be entrusted to an insurance company.

Unfortunately there are sometimes legal difficulties in the way of an insurance company being appointed executor or trustee unless the appointment is definitely provided for by the testator; these arise from the absence of provision for remuneration to trustees. Even this difficulty may be got over to some extent, but by far the best plan is for the person who is settling or leaving the money to appoint an insurance company, or at least make specific provision for such an appointment should it prove desirable. The cost is very small, the benefits are very great, and it can scarcely be long before the foolish system that has prevailed in the past has entirely disappeared.

QUEER STORY.

EXPLOITING A "STAR."

MISS FAIRY RUBENS, long a considerable star in the music-hall firmament, had just reached that period of her career when she was beginning to grow a trifle stale. She still, indeed, retained her looks—by artificial light, at any rate; and her figure, thanks to judicious dieting and a skilled corsetière, was as good as ever it had been. But she had recently become conscious of a loss of the old grip upon her public, and the fact, very naturally, filled her with concern.

Already she was being billed in smaller type than various new rivals. Already managers, who in her zenith had been hat in hand to her, were treating her with quite an off-hand air. Already, instead of being inundated with offers of engagements, she was having to put her pride in her pocket and seek them out for herself. These were signs much too significant to be overlooked. Her popularity was on the wane, and unless something could be done to rehabilitate it, she felt that she would soon slip from the notice of the fickle public altogether. It was a mortifying—a disquieting prospect. No wonder Fairy Rubens felt very much perturbed.

It was one afternoon, about this time, that she received a call from Mr. Gillson Ferrier. Mr. Ferrier was not known to her personally; indeed, when she read his name on the visiting card which he sent in, she did not recollect ever to have heard it. But surmising, or at least hoping, that the "important business" on which he desired to see her might have to do with some offer of professional employment, she consented to see him.

Mr. Gillson Ferrier was a youngish man—apparently not more than five-and-thirty, very keen of face, alert of bearing, and brisk of manner. He was faultlessly attired in the latest sartorial fashions, and gave the general impression of being thoroughly up-to-date.

"Good morning, madam," he said, making the lady an elaborate bow.

"Good morning," she replied, then looked at him inquiringly, as inviting him to state his business.

"I have done myself the honour of waiting upon you," explained Mr. Ferrier, "in order to lay before you a proposition which may be of advantage to us both. I should tell you that I am connected with the Universal News Agency, an association recently formed for the collection and dissemination of the latest intelligence, upon lines more go-ahead than have been hitherto adopted in this country. Our methods, I may say, have already caught on, and we are in hourly communication with all the leading organs of the London press."

"I see. You want to interview me, perhaps?" smiled Fairy Rubens.

"Well, not exactly that," replied Mr. Gillson Ferrier, "although an interview might very usefully be worked in later on, as a follow-up. The truth is this, Miss Rubens: I have noticed of late with regret, and I may add with pain—for I have always been an admirer of yours——"

"Oh, never mind the soft soap," interposed the lady, though with a not ill-pleased laugh.

"I repeat, I have observed with regret and pain," continued Mr. Ferrier, "that for some unaccountable reason you are no longer quite the public favourite that you once were; that——"

"Well, well. And if I am not? We must all have our little ups and downs," broke in Fairy Rubens, rather irritably, for the subject was a sore one.

"Quite so," assented Mr. Gillson Ferrier. "But the more 'ups' and the less 'downs' the better. I am sure you will agree with me there. And when you feel yourself beginning to go on the downward grade, it's a sign that you want a fillip, something to bring you before the public notice, something to get you talked about. Now—forgive me for saying so—but I am convinced that you require such a fillip at the present moment, Miss Rubens. I am also convinced that the Universal News Agency is the best medium to supply it. You follow me?"

"I think so. You are suggesting that I should place with your agency a commission to advertise me?"

"Yes; that is what it comes to," answered Mr. Ferrier, genially. "I am, in fact, proposing that you should allow us to bring you before the public in connection with some interesting experience—say, an operation for appendicitis, a motor accident, or a sensational jewel robbery——"

"All imaginary, of course," smiled Fairy Rubens.

"Not more so than half the things you read in the newspapers every day," said Mr. Gillson Ferrier. "This is the era of imaginative journalism. A man who has not the mind of a ready romancer is no use whatever on our modern press. Such a mind, I may add without boasting, is peculiarly highly developed among the staff of the Universal News Agency."

"You are candid, at any rate," replied Fairy Rubens, laughing outright.

"I am always candid in business," said Mr. Ferrier. "We pull the leg of the public to any extent, of course. But we always run straight in dealing with a client. Coming back to the main issue, however, what do you think of my suggestion?"

"It strikes me that there is something in it," answered Miss Rubens.

"There is everything in it," declared Mr. Ferrier. "The appendicitis and the motor-accident lay are rather played out, for the moment. We've had too much of them. But a good, thumping, sensational jewel robbery hasn't been done now for some time. And I am of opinion that, if we played it just now, we should find it a sure card. 'Thieves' great haul.' 'Popular artiste robbed of £40,000 worth of jewellery'——"

"Forty thousand pounds! Oh, come, I say! That's opening our mouth rather wide," laughed Fairy Rubens.

"In these cases one always multiplies the value of the stones by ten," said Mr. Ferrier.

"But will the public swallow such a figure?" inquired Miss Rubens.

"The public—the halfpenny public, at any rate—will swallow anything it sees in print, provided the headlines are heavy enough," said Mr. Ferrier, with confidence.

"But will the halfpenny papers print such a tall story?" persisted Miss Rubens.

"The halfpenny papers will print anything that their public will swallow—and pay for," answered Mr. Ferrier.

"It's really rather funny," smiled Fairy.

"Well, it's journalism," replied Mr. Ferrier.

"I think, though, I should like to see what you say, before you put anything in the papers," she remarked, after a moment's reflection.

"You shall see a proof to-morrow, and may amend it in any way you please," he rejoined.

"And as to terms?" inquired Miss Rubens.

"Oh, I do not propose to make you any charge," said Mr. Ferrier, generously.

"You are very kind. But I would rather treat it as a matter of business and pay the usual fees," she answered.

"There are no usual fees in these cases," he assured her, with a wave of his hand. "We get well paid by the papers for the copy with which we supply them, and are quite satisfied with that source of profit. All we expect our private clients to do is to endorse what we have said about them, if interviewers, or other inquisitive persons, come to pester them with inquiries."

"I see," nodded Miss Rubens. "You mean—putting it crudely—you and I must agree to tell the same lie?"

"It is a word we never use in our business," answered Mr. Ferrier, deprecatingly. "But, in substance, your inference is perfectly correct."

Shortly afterwards, having in the meanwhile jotted down various items of circumstantial information about Fairy, with which the lady readily supplied him, Mr. Gillson Ferrier took his departure, promising to bring his proof round on the following morning.

This he duly did, and the flamboyant account of the imaginary robbery tickled the lady's sense of humour not a little. She suggested a few alterations here and there, which Mr. Ferrier at once embodied; and in this slightly amended form it appeared in most of that day's halfpenny evening papers, and also, next day, in the morning journals to which they were affiliated.

News happened to be scarce just then; so the robbery attracted a good deal of public attention. Of this Fairy Rubens was soon made practically aware, for she spent a good part of next day in receiving and replying to the questions of interviewers. It is to be hoped that she may be pardoned for all the fibs that she told these enterprising journalists. It is to be hoped that they, also, may be pardoned for the imaginative manner in which they subsequently embroidered them. Not that the subject of their interviews had any grievance against them on this account. Quite the reverse. The more picturesquely they presented her, the more romantic stories they attached to her stolen jewellery, the better she was pleased. But on this aspect of the matter I have no time to dwell. I must hurry on to describe to you an interviewer of a somewhat different character, who called upon the fair Miss Rubens on the day after the theft of her jewels was first announced in the papers.

This was a young American gentleman, who introduced himself as Mr. Cyrus P. Riley, representative of the International Assurance Company of New York, who were just then opening a branch office in London.

Mr. Cyrus P. Riley was a typical Yankee, both in appearance, manner, and accent. He also had the typical Yankee eye to smart business, as may be gathered from the astutely daring proposal which he had come to make to Miss Fairy Rubens.

"Say," he began, "I am from the International Assurance Company of New York. I see you've been robbed of two hundred thousand dollars' worth of stuff. And I calculated it might be of mutual advantage to us both if you were insured in our office."

"Not much good doing that now, I think," answered Miss Rubens. "Rather like shutting the stable door after the steed has been stolen."

Mr. Cyrus P. Riley smiled placidly at Miss Rubens. Then the lid of his left eye dropped, slightly, in an almost imperceptible wink, as he replied:

"Wa-a-l, miss, let's put it this way. I guess it might suit both you and my company very well if you were to say that you were insured with us for the full amount. . . . What?"

"I don't quite follow you," rejoined Fairy Rubens, looking, as she felt, decidedly puzzled.

Mr. Cyrus P. Riley dived into the breast pocket of his coat and pulled out a roll of Bank of England notes, which he threw down on the table near which he was standing.

"There are a thousand dollars there," he said; "and I guess they're yours, if ye'll do business on the lines suggested."

Fairy Rubens eyed the £200 avariciously. Her professional income had never been anything like as large as popularly supposed, and, though even the real amount was considerable, she had always lived fully up to it. The consequence was she was in a chronic state of being short of ready. At this moment she wanted money rather badly to pay some pressing debts with. So the bank notes were a decided temptation to her.

However, she was not going to commit herself by accepting the bribe (for bribe it obviously was) until she understood what was involved by so doing; and she answered:

"I must first ask you to explain what you mean, for I haven't the least idea what you are driving at."

Mr. Cyrus P. Riley raised his eyebrows in some surprise.

"Wa-a-l," he said, "I guess if you'd been an Amur-r-can, you'd have cottoned on to my meaning right away. But as it is, I must dot the 'i's a bit more plainly. See here, now. My company's just opening a branch office in London. We want an advertisement; and we're willing to pay you a thousand dollars for giving it us. Now, miss, can't ye see?"

Fairy Rubens nodded.

"You mean," she said, "that you are offering me a thousand dollars to say that my jewels were insured in your office, because you think it would be a good advertisement for you?"

"That's so," replied Mr. Cyrus P. Riley. "We want you to say that, and also to accept, or at least not to disclaim, the consequences incident to it—on paper."

And again he winked at Miss Rubens.

"What consequences?" she inquired.

"Wa a-l," he said, "assuming you to have effected a policy with us before the robbery, I guess that policy would now have become a claim. The public, therefore, when they hear you were insured in our office for the full value of your stuff, will naturally suppose that you are drawing £40,000 from us. And we don't want you to undeceive them. That's all."

"I don't quite understand you yet," said Miss Rubens. "How will it benefit you for people to think that you have had to pay me £40,000?"

Mr. Cyrus P. Riley fixed his eyes, in which there was a peculiarly knowing twinkle, full upon Fairy Rubens' own.

"It would be the greatest benefit to us—in fact, a tarnation advertisement of the first water," he replied, "if the public got to know that, the moment you preferred your claim, we'd settled up in full, on the nail, without a word of question or dispute. See?"

"Ah, now I understand," laughed Miss Rubens. "But how would the public get to know this?"

"Through the press. We'd take care of that," answered Mr. Cyrus P. Riley. "Wa-a-l, miss, I guess you've heard the offer and you've seen the cash. Shall it be a deal? What do you say?"

THE CARLTON HOTEL, PALL MALL, S.W.—1503 Gerrard. Famous for its beautiful Restaurant and Grill Room. Under the same Direction as the Ritz Hotel.

The sight of £200 in bank notes was a stronger temptation than Miss Fairy Rubens could resist just then. She took the money and clinched the bargain.

Mr. Cyrus P. Riley went away looking very well pleased with himself. He had no reason to do otherwise, for the advertisement thus obtained by exploiting the sensation of the Fairy Rubens robbery was uncommonly cheap at the money. Yes, indeed, though his company had, no doubt, to pay handsomely, in addition, for the various paragraphs in the daily papers which they took care to have inserted shortly afterwards, and which were really nothing but veiled puffs of the International Assurance Office—even so, I say, the money was well laid out. I don't know exactly how many ladies insured their valuable jewellery for large amounts in the Office during the subsequent fortnight, but I do know that the number must have run into several hundreds.

Curiously enough, it was not long before a large number of these policies matured into claims. . . What? You suspect that this is to be accounted for by the fact that the jewellery had been insured at fictitious values, and that the robberies on which the claims were based were merely bogus? Well, if that is your inference, you are entirely wrong. The robberies and the consequent claims were, in every case, quite genuine. The one bogus feature in the whole business was the International Assurance Company itself, as the unfortunate policy-holders very soon found out. Having sent in their claims and received no replies, they went to make personal inquiries. They then found the temporary offices from which the company had conducted its operations—four rooms on a third floor in Basinghall-street—shut up, and were told by the caretaker that the landlord was in for rent, and that the "Company" (which appeared to have consisted of two gentlemen) had suddenly departed a week or so before, leaving no address.

This was an unpleasant enough shock for the policy-holders in all conscience. But a worse was to come. For, when the matter was placed in the hands of the City Police, the Inspector in charge of the case, after making certain inquiries, paid a visit to Miss Fairy Rubens.

"May I ask," he said, when he had informed her that he was a police officer, and had explained the object of his visit, "whether that jewel robbery of yours was not a purely put-up affair, suggested to you, and arranged for you, by a man passing under the name of Gillson Ferrier?"

Miss Rubens, thoroughly frightened by the turn matters had taken, confessed that such was the case.

"And am I not correct in saying," the Inspector went on, "that the statements which appeared in the press to the effect that you were insured with the International Office, and that they paid up your claim for £40,000 without a murmur, was also a put-up thing, arranged with you by an American calling himself Cyrus P. Riley, and emanating in a proposal made to you by him?"

"It is all too dreadfully true," admitted Fairy Rubens, beginning to sob. "But I never guessed that the insurance company was all a swindle, and that they were exploiting me for fraudulent purposes. Indeed, I never guessed or imagined that!"

The Inspector nodded.

"I do not suppose that any one would suspect you of being an intentional party to the fraud," he said. "Though, in thus having allowed yourself to be used as a decoy, you have certainly placed yourself in a very unfortunate position."

"I'm sure I hope the wretch will be caught and punished," sobbed Miss Rubens.

"The wretches, you mean," said the Inspector, drily. "For surely by this time you must have realised that Ferrier and Riley were exploiting you in concert?"

"No, I had not realised that. You mean that Ferrier's visit to me was all part of this wicked insurance fraud?"

"Oh, the insurance fraud was merely a blind for something else," answered the Inspector. "These fellows were after bigger game than a few hundred pounds in the shape of insurance premiums. I have ascertained who they are; though, as they have got clear away, I doubt if we shall catch them. They are two of the smartest jewel thieves that ever came over here from the States."

"Jewel thieves! I do not understand."

"No? Let me explain, then. It was not, as I have said, the insurance premiums they wanted, but the names of ladies who possessed valuable jewellery, with full schedules and particulars of the same. With the information thus obtained, they were able to go straight to the right houses, and——"

"What?" cried out Fairy, "you mean that they themselves stole the jewels of the ladies who had insured with them?"

"Just so," said the Inspector. "That is precisely what they did."

ART NOTES.

IT is a fortunate circumstance that each picture-dealer, to say nothing of each painter, should have his own especial following, for thus only is it possible to contemplate the annual artistic harvest of Bond-street without weakening of the brain. As it is, there must be not one artistic public, as we usually suppose, but many of them, each knowing only of the Art which is provided at the particular gallery with which it is indissolubly linked, and with but one point of knowledge—that the R.A. shows are held in Burlington House—in common with the other publics. There are many proofs of this remarkable state of things. I will mention but one—that each of the many galleries has an artistic convention of its own to which it always adheres, and which its particular public no doubt regards as the only genuine brand of art. Thus at one gallery you will find only the rigidly revolutionary, at another only that sort of art which is universally associated with red dining-room walls and pianolas. At some galleries you know that you may always look forward to seeing at least moderately good work; there are two or three which are widely famous as housing—and, be it said, selling—only the very vilest of daubs. Is it possible to conceive that there is any one public which can assimilate all this artistic olla podrida? Of course not. There are dozens of them, each only realising the existence of one brand of art, and oblivious of the rest.

Take one example, Messrs. Shepherd's galleries in King-street. If you go there you may always be sure of finding one kind of picture—and one which happens to be among the best and most interesting—I mean Early British Masters. There are others, of course, but the chief fame—and, so far as I am concerned, the chief attraction—of the gallery lies in its appreciation of the fine work of our own School of Old Masters. Year after year exhibitions are held, and they always contain something of the first interest. This year, for instance there are a couple of canvases—not to speak of the rest—which are worth travelling a long way to see. One of them is a somewhat varied replica of the Van Dyck equestrian portrait of Charles I. in the National Gallery, of which there is a variant in the Royal Collection. It is attributed to Gainsborough, who was notoriously fond of copying Van Dyck, and who left at his death a number of copies which were said to be indistinguishable from the originals. If we consider the handling, especially of the sky, there seems little reason to doubt the attribution, and it is interesting to notice how much more life-like and anatomically correct is the Gainsborough horse than the snake-headed over-necked animal in the original. The other especially noteworthy picture is a fine R. P. Bonington, of unusual size and great beauty, "The Abbey of St. Bertin, St. Omer." I am somewhat at a difficulty about this picture, because I do not want to describe it as "pearly," which is a much-hackneyed adjective in this connection. But I cannot find another which is one-quarter so descriptive, so it must pass at that. On the whole, if I formed part of any one of the various artistic publics I think I should like to belong to Messrs. Shepherd's. At least, I should feel that when I bought a picture I was not buying a pig in a poke.

Another public which may count on good guidance is that which revolves around the Dowdeswell Galleries in New Bond-street. They are more interested in the modern British school—but only on the safer side. So accordingly, although, as it happens, the exhibition which is now being held there does not appeal to me personally, I feel quite disposed to admit that there may be another point of view, which I certainly should not were the pictures being shown at some galleries I could mention. They are by Mr. Walter Crane, and they are a number of water-colours dealing with India and Ceylon. They are painted in a curiously thick way, and their colour is hard and cold, so that altogether they give the impression of being studies in brick-dust, the more so that several of them contain passages of a peculiarly irritating browny-purple. I like Mr. Crane's work much better when he composes himself to designing children's fairy books, because he then shows himself to be a master of his art, while in such sketches as these he is but one man among many. But at the worst his work is always deserving of attention, and of how few artists can that be said nowadays.

There are some galleries which carry catholicity of appreciation almost too far. The Grafton is one of them. You are never in the least sure of what you are going to see there. Just now you will find a vast number of paintings by members of La Société des Aquarellistes Français, and of La Société des Peintres de Marine. I do not know why these two societies should hang their works together, unless, indeed, because there is a certain watery suggestion about both of their titles. Neither do I see why the cover of the catalogue should be adorned by French and English flags and the magic words "Entente Cordiale," unless, indeed, it be a naïve attempt to make artistic hay while the political sun shines. It is not as if these were the first French water-colours and seascapes to be exhibited for sale in England. Not by a very long way. It is not even as if they were especially fine water-colours and seascapes, so that they might provide us with a more cordial understanding than hitherto of the highest French artistic attainments. They do serve, it is true, to show how much further advanced are British water-colour and sea-painters than are their French colleagues, but that, I take it, is scarcely the purpose of the show. There are a couple of military sketches by Edouard Detaille, a rather effective if theatrical "Wreck" by M. Tattegrain, and perhaps a dozen other paintings and drawings of note; but the general impression is one of superficiality. Most of the work is more or less clever, much of it attempts originality, of which we are all getting rather tired nowadays; a very large number of the water-colours remind us of mineral water advertisements, and, excellent as are mineral waters in their way, they are not what one wants to think about in a picture gallery.

Mr. D. Y. Cameron's etchings have, and rightly, a special public of their own, which will no doubt have followed them to Messrs. Connell's Gallery in Old Bond-street. Many of them are notoriously very beautiful, but there is no need for me to say anything further about them, because Mr. Frederick Wedmore has contributed an appreciation to the catalogue, which makes further comment superfluous. I notice, by the way, that this pleasant method of lightening the labours of the critic is on the increase. For instance, there is a collection of water-colours, by Mr. Arthur Reginald Smith, now being shown at the New Dudley Gallery. It deals with scenes in Tuscany, Umbria, and Rome, and to the ordinary mind does not appear extraordinary. But the ordinary mind is wrong in this, for some one, whose signature is "B. A. S.," tells us in the preface of the catalogue that "Mr. Smith is a perfect master of his medium, yet he never allows his dexterity to run away with him; he makes no brilliant display of technique for its own sake, all the means are subordinated to a sympathetic interpretation of his subject, and this he does with a simplicity and mastery that carries on the very best traditions of the English School of Water-Colour Painting." That is what I call handsome, and I do not know any newspaper critic that could have done it better, however much he had been paid for doing it.

There are so many exhibitions open just now that it is impossible to refer to half of them in the limit of any ordinary article. Here are a few which strike me as having points of interest, to their own particular publics, at any rate. At Messrs. Grundy and Robinson's there are a number of Venetian studies, in water-colours and oil, by Mr. T. Hodgson Liddell. Some of them are effective and not without their appeal, though they would be more so did they not convey the impression of being hurried and were the painter more sure of his colour schemes. At the same galleries are a number of paintings by M. François Brunery, extremely able in technique, if lacking in sympathy. M. Brunery has a nice eye for the colour possibilities in a Cardinal's robes, and he can put character into a head, as in the case of "A Gentleman of France." At Mr. Paterson's Old Bond-street Gallery is a very interesting collection of drawings and sketches of various of the more prominent of our younger artists, including Mr. D. J. Cameron, Mr. J. Paterson, Mr. W. Orpen, Mr. Clausen, and Mr. Rackham. Especially striking are some of Mr. Crawhall's animal studies; Mr. Rackham's brilliantly elusive "Poultry"; Mr. Cameron's "Afterglow," in which the artist shows himself unexpectedly sentimental; and Mr. James Peterson's pale and convincing "On the Forth."

At the Doré Gallery are shown paintings by Miss Fanny Farrer and water-colour drawings by Mrs. Philip de Crespigny, and at the Alpine Club Gallery, in Savile-row, are some extremely beautiful photographs of Alpine scenery.

MUSIC.

SOME CONCERT-ROOM BORES.

THESE are of many kinds. Apart from such obvious afflictions as the late-comer, the talker, and the like, there are others which, if less pronounced, are hardly less trying in their way. The enthusiast with a defective sense of rhythm, for example, who nods his (or more frequently her) head throughout the music hopelessly out of time. The superior person, again, who delivers judgment after each item, in that penetrating "head" voice affected by superior persons, for the benefit of his (or her) immediate neighbours—who has not endured too often that particular affliction? The sorrow's crown of sorrow in this case is perhaps the conviction which you know is cherished by your tormentor that he is exciting your secret admiration, and the utter impossibility of undeceiving him on the point. A bore of another sort is the individual who follows with special interest the fortunes of particular performers, and demands that all and sundry shall share his enthusiasm. People of this type make critics their special prey. "Did you ever hear anything finer?" "Isn't he immense?"—in such wise as this they ply their tiresome trade, as often as not doing far more harm than good to the cause thus injudiciously commended. Conversely, the rivals of their favourites are decried—with results which are probably equally contrary to those which they anticipate. "Save me from my friends!" might well be the wish of those who suffer at the hands of such self-constituted champions.

The blasé concert-goer who finds nothing to his liking is yet another bore to be found—and avoided—in every audience; the only source of wonder being the fact that under the circumstances he does not stay away from performances which to all seeming yield him nothing but distress. In point of fact, of course, it is his highest joy to advertise the acuteness of his perceptions in this manner; but if his impressions are really those which he reports, he is clearly an object for the sincerest pity. It is worth noticing in this connection that the most gifted musicians are seldom afflicted in this painful manner. Your great artist usually makes the most receptive and responsive listener. Then there is the chatty neighbour who insists on conversing, not only during the performance, but also on discussing each item exhaustively on its conclusion —who calls upon you to stand and deliver respecting each work performed, and—what is almost worse—expects you to give an equally attentive ear to his own impressions. These are usually people who do not go to concerts often. The experienced concert-goer generally takes what he has heard for granted, or at all events keeps his opinions to himself.

Another type who is often a nuisance is the earnest student with the score, who regards with pitying contempt his humbler neighbours content to enjoy the music without such aids, and resents with unbridled ferocity the least whisper or movement which disturbs his (or her) rapt enjoyment of the performance. Yet if such would only recognise it, they really derive the keenest delight from the joy of silencing their neighbours by the fierce "'Sh! 'sh!" which crushes the offender and proclaims their high-souled superiority. At the other end of the scale is the unabashed Philistine who has strayed by accident into a serious concert, the devotional atmosphere of which is painfully perturbed by his presence. He may often be seen at the Promenade Concerts, where he pilots a showily dressed companion to a place in the front row during the breathless silence attending a performance of, say, the "Charfreitagszauber," sublimely unconscious of the enormity of his offence. Indeed, orchestral music he regards only as a convenient background for conversation. On the other hand, he is, like Sir George Grove's historic policeman-friend, "a hog at the wocal," and if there is not plenty of singing in the programme he considers that he has been defrauded. A minor annoyance of another kind is the raucous-voiced programme-seller, who maintains a loud conversation outside the hall while the music is proceeding within. At such moments boiling oil with something lingering seems a penalty all too mild for the offender. But a complete list of all the woes of the sensitive concert-goer would make up an extensive catalogue.

An interesting event at Covent Garden next week will be the big matinée which the Duchess of Connaught is organising in aid of the funds of the Royal Albert Orphanage Asylum, Bagshot. The King, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and several other members of the Royal family will be present, while the programme will be quite on gala lines. Mme. Melba's appearance in the second act of "La Tosca" will be particularly interesting, since she has never been heard in the work before, while she is also to take part with Caruso in an act from "Traviata." Other artists who are giving their services include Mme. Destinn, Signor Scotti and Dr. Richter (who will conduct the second act of "The Flying Dutchman"), and altogether it will be rather surprising if a very handsome sum is not realised for the charity named.

As regards the gala performance at Covent Garden on June 11 in honour of the visit of the King and Queen of Denmark, arrangements are already in progress, though it is not possible at present to say much on the subject beyond that it seems likely to prove fully the equal in point of brilliance and attractiveness of any that have been given of recent years. A performance of this kind entails, of course, an enormous amount of work on the executive, but as they are enabled to get back a substantial return on their outlay from the high prices charged, the duty is undertaken with a cheerful heart. The same general arrangements in regard to the decoration and seating of the house will obtain as on former occasions —special boxes for the Royalties and their guests being constructed in the middle of the grand tier, the foyer being converted into a supper room, and so on.

In connection with the present opera season, by the way, one small reform has been introduced which deserves a word of grateful recognition. This is the addition of the little time-tables to the nightly programmes giving an idea of the duration of the acts and intervals. For some years the thing has been done in connection with the special "Ring" performances, in which case it was, of course, absolutely necessary, but it is an innovation as regards the others, and one which certainly makes for the general convenience.

Whitsuntide has brought its usual pause in the musical world, but several interesting concerts were given last week, notably the piano recital at which Mme. Sophie Menter appeared. She plays almost as marvellously as ever, and the reference is not merely to the prodigious volume of tone which she produces and her superb technique, but to the unerring taste and feeling by which her art is informed. On the same afternoon Mr. Mark Hambourg played at the Queen's Hall, and the contrast was rather striking. Another great woman artist heard was Mlle. Camilla Landi, who gave a recital at the Bechstein Hall. She was not in perfect voice, but sang superbly none the less, giving, among other things, "With verdure clad" and "He shall feed His flock" with rare charm and beauty of expression. Some excellent singing was heard also from Herr Paul Schmedes, a Danish tenor possessed of a capital voice, which he uses with a fine sense of style.

Dr. Richter's many admirers will be glad to notice that, in recognition of the thirtieth anniversary of his first appearance in London, the London Symphony Orchestra have arranged to give an orchestral concert at the Queen's Hall early next month. Dr. Richter will himself conduct, of course, and a bumper audience should be assured. It had been suggested, it appears, that precisely the same programme should be given as that of the concert which Dr. Richter first directed in London, but this notion has, it seems, been abandoned. There are, however, certain works which obviously suggest themselves in such a connection as those in which Richter has always been unsurpassable, though it would be hard to make choice among so many. In the way of Wagnerian excerpts, the "Meistersinger" overture and the prelude to the third act, the "Tristan" prelude and Liebestod, and, say, the Trauermarsch from the "Ring" could, however, hardly be omitted, while a Beethoven symphony and also, if possible, something of Mozart (say, the G minor or the "Jupiter") would also find a place of necessity in any thoroughly representative "Richter" programme.

Another forthcoming concert of a special character for which support is invited is that which is being organised by Dr. Charles Harriss, in conjunction with the Victoria League, in celebration of Empire Day (May 24) and for the benefit of the Victoria League and the Empire Education Fund.

Once again the grievance of the charity concert has been raised, and it is a very genuine one from the standpoint of the professional musician, who, like the rest of us, has his living to get. Musical performers suffer by these charity concerts in two ways. In the first place, their own concerts, given on a commercial basis, cannot hope to compete with entertainments in which half-a-dozen "stars" join forces without fee or reward to attract the public. Secondly, they suffer by being compelled, or virtually compelled, to give their services gratuitously on these occasions. To them does not even accrue that acceptable advertisement which the big folk obtain, since they are merely referred to, if named at all, as "others who contributed to the success of the entertainment," or in some equally satisfying manner. No wonder they are inclined to kick. A year or so ago a movement was started to insist on at least half fees for all appearing at such entertainments, but I fear little came of it.

Mr. Oscar Hammerstein, the intrepid impresario of the Manhattan Opera House, who is now paying a visit to Europe in search of talent, has been explaining to admiring interviewers who have complimented him on his New York success how it is done—as thus:—

When I started my scheme to give the people grand opera there was an opinion in New York that I was a fit subject for a lunatic asylum. But I have exploded the theory that grand opera can only be appreciated by multi-millionaires or those whom in this country you would describe as the aristocracy. . . . . My idea has not been to erect a building with tier above tier of boxes to be filled by the rich, although they also come to my opera house, but I started to cater for the people with the best that the world can give. . . . . In England I have heard it said that grand opera is not popular with the masses. Have you attempted to provide proper accommodation for the people to hear grand opera? That is just what has not been done, and that is just my mission in the United States.

When shall we have our Hammerstein in London?

Some interesting impressions of his recent visit to the States which Dr. Saint-Saëns has contributed to a Paris paper are reproduced in the New York Musical Courier. From the musical point of view he speaks in praise of the standard of taste prevailing. "I have often found better taste in America than in certain towns of Europe that I will take care not to name. . . . I have found excellent orchestras in which there were often French artists, and often good conductors. It was necesary for me to find again the fingers of the past in order to play my concerto in G minor that everybody wished to hear executed by the author. This did not much please me, as to-day young men play it better than I do, and I myself prefer to play the fifth, that is more suitable to my present capacity. I played my G minor at Washington in the presence of President Roosevelt, who, after having graciously received me, did me the rare and signal honour of coming to hear me play. Yes, America pleased me, and I would willingly return to it. But should I like to live there? That is another question." Dr. Saint-Saëns, by the way, has recently been paying a flying visit to London.

Some remarks ascribed to Mme. Melba the other day in connection with the laying of the corner stone of the new factory that is being built at Hayes, Middlesex, by the Gramophone and Typewriter, Ltd., are sufficiently apt to deserve reproduction from the Tribune:—

The element of permanence which has hitherto been one of the great forces drawing men towards the arts of literature, painting, and sculpture seems likely to be added to the other attractions of the arts of music and singing by the perfecting of the gramophone. The singer's voice will no longer be something merely ephemeral, to be enjoyed by a single generation and then lost amid the mists of tradition. That is one of the reasons why I take so much interest in all that appertains to the gramophone and its development.

That is very well said, and the point is one which is sometimes overlooked by superior persons, who regard the so-called "talking machine" as a contrivance which has merely added a new terror to existence. The great vocalist of to-day, it may be stated as a literal truth, sings not for an age, but for all time, in virtue of this amazing invention, and though it may be some time yet before the reproduction equals the original in all respects, the vast improvement which has already been effected in this respect supplies the best reason for thinking that eventually the one will be almost indistinguishable from the other.

Herr Kubelik is surely the most litigious of all living concert artists, and what is worse, he seems usually to be on the losing side. Some years ago, it may be remembered, he brought an unsuccessful action for libel against a Frankfort musical critic, who had commented unflatteringly upon his personal appearance. More recently he was involved in a suit brought against his agent in respect of a poster which the latter had declined to pay for, and now the litigation which he has been carrying on for a considerable time past with M. Schürmann, the Parisian impresario, has resulted in his being cast in £80 damages for breach of contract during a tour in Spain and Portugal. Among other things, Kubelik declined, it appears, ever to play on two successive evenings, alleging sometimes as a reason that "the soul of his Stradivari was out of sorts," and generally sorely tried his manager, who wrote in desperation to M. Schürmann that "it would be easier to tame a cage of wild beasts" than this intractable child of genius. Now Kubelik will have to pay up. The artistic temperament is apt to get nasty rubs in the law courts.

Why do lady artists wear their hats at afternoon performances? It is an absurd custom which has its counterpart in the suède gloves of your conventional tenor. It always suggests that the performer is more concerned respecting his or her appearance than as to the music in hand. Really serious artists never condescend to such trivialities. Imagine Lady Hallé playing Beethoven's violin concerto in a bonnet! Yet this would not be more incongruous than Mme. Ada Crossley, say, singing Schubert's songs in a hat. The liking for wearing their hats indoors in this ridiculous manner seems to be shared by the more frivolous sort of lady vocalists with our old friends Mrs. Gamp and Mrs. Harris.

Should applause in the concert-room be abolished? There are always some super-sensitive souls to tell us that it is a relic of barbarism, and one such has, I notice, recently been propounding a novel remedy for what he denounces as an insupportable affliction. Despairing apparently of suppressing the hateful thing entirely, he suggests that "audiences should count inaudibly two bars before giving free rein to their clamant desire to reward the players." It is certainly a novel idea, and the spectacle of a large audience silently counting its two bars before giving vent to its feelings would be an inspiring one. The worst of it is that audiences are often very intractable in such matters—as Lord Kilmorey discovered the other day at the Santley Jubilee Concert, when he attempted to conduct a spirited rendering of that soulful chorus, "For he's a jolly good fellow." Apart from this, applause happens to be, in point of fact, the life and soul of public music. There is nothing more depressing than musical performances—those given in churches and cathedrals, for example—at which such demonstrations are prohibited.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—"The Secrets of the Vatican" (1) suggests Protestant disclosures of Borgia horrors, but Mr. Douglas Sladen, in this interesting, sumptuously got-up, and elaborate guide-book to the palace of the Pope's, is as sympathetic as a broad-minded Protestant could possibly be in his treatment of his subject. He is, indeed, so impartially sympathetic as to insert as much of the Archbishop of Westminster's address to the Catholic Conference at Brighton as bore upon the current crisis of the Church in France—not itself, perhaps, a notably impartial statement of the case. Mr. Douglas Sladen's main aim, however, is to supply at once the tourist and the stay-at-home reader, whether Catholic or Protestant, with a description of those parts of the Vatican which are not generally visited, either because they are inacessible to the ordinary visitor, or because the ordinary visitor has no idea of their existence. Yet more interesting are Mr. Douglas Sladen's incidental chapters upon the homely daily life and "the sad splendour" of the death of a Pope; of the ceremonial of his election; and of the various functions of Cardinals, of the Sacred Congregations, and of the Pope's household generally. It may, perhaps, be as great a surprise to you as it was to me in my Protestant ignorance to learn that a layman may be, and has been, elected Pope.

According to the strict letter of the law any Roman Catholic male is eligible for the papacy. John XIX., elected Pope in 1024, and, perhaps, Hadrian V., elected Pope in 1276, were actually laymen. The Anti-Pope, Felix V., who reigned from 1439-1449 was certainly a layman, for he was Duke of Savoy. In the first eleven centuries of the Papacy deacons and priests were habitually elected Popes; in fact, up to the end of the ninth century only one bishop, Formosus (891-896), was elected Pope.

The greatest of all the Popes, Gregory VII., the Warwick of the Papacy, was a simple Deacon at his election. Pius III. and the magnificent Leo X. were also only Deacons at their election. Since, however, Urban VI. (1378) only one Pope has been elected who was not a Cardinal. After the Great Schism (1378 to 1409) the Popes, with three exceptions—Calixtus III., Alexander VI., and Hadrian VI.—have been Italians. As the Dutchman, Hadrian VI., was elected under the influence of Charles V., the only two exceptions which count are Calixtus III. and Alexander VI., and as these Spaniards were the Borgia Popes, the precedents for the election of foreigners to the Papacy are not encouraging. Before the Great Schism, however, many foreigners were elected to the Papacy—twenty-two Oriental, seventeen French, a few Germans and Spaniards, one Dutchman, and one Englishman. For the last three centuries the Popes have been generally nobly born, but the magnificent Sixtus V. and the present Pope were both of humble origin. For the present Pope Mr. Douglas Sladen's reverence is profound, and, indeed, his account of Cardinal Sarto's sincere and saintly shrinking from the appalling responsibilities of the Chair of St. Peter—which for hours before the altar with tears and prayers he deprecated—would alone justify this reverence. Nor has promotion to that dizzy and dreaded height affected the singleness, simplicity, and humility of the Pope's character. When the Papal nobility begged him to make his homely sisters countesses at least, he replied, smiling, "I have made them sisters of the Pope." When the aristocratic Catholics of Lucca objected to the low birth of an Archbishop he had appointed to that see, he asked: "Am I then to understand that you would have rejected me as a man of low birth if I had been appointed a few months ago Archbishop of Lucca instead of Pope?" A poor priest who was similarly objected to when, as Cardinal Sarto, Archbishop of Venice, he would have appointed him to a vacancy in the Chapter of St. Mark's, when Pope he promoted as Patriarch to rule over the very Chapter of which he was deemed unfit to be a member. Mr. Douglas Sladen, in the excess of his sympathy with his subject, praises the authorities of the Vatican Library for their breadth of mind in exhibiting prominently the writings of Martin Luther. I fancy, however, you will see rather policy than tolerance in the exhibition as Luther's manuscript of a translation of the Bible, with the following prayer, in the same writing, appended:—

> O God, be graciously pleased to grant us clothes and hats, cloaks and gowns, fat calves and goats, oxen, sheep and bulls, many wives and few children. Bad meat and ill-drink make life uneasy.

We credit Catholics with so many incredible things that it is quite possible they, in their turn, should sincerely believe this prayer to be Luther's. The most amusing thing in Mr. Douglas Sladen's admirable book is the compromise made by a pious Pope, who begged the Sultan of Turkey to confer upon his mule the splendid decoration his conscience forbade him to accept for himself. The Sultan accordingly sent his Holiness's mule a gorgeous crimson velvet saddle and a caparison covered with diamonds. Then the pious Pope, after the diamonds had been duly consecrated by presentation to his mule, felt free to appropriate them to his own use! I have no doubt that Mr. Douglas Sladen's sumptuous volume is the book of the day at once for visitors to the Vatican in person and for those who must content themselves with visiting it in spirit.

Mr. Charles Marriott's "The Remnant" (2) contrasts the conventional and unconventional, or rather the tamed and untamed inhabitants of a Cornish village, which is in the grip of a masterful magnate, who insists upon making every one healthy, wealthy, happy and wise in his own despotic way. Among the untamed are his own imbecile father, his own high-spirited daughter, and even his own wife, who takes a secret and sensual pleasure in thrashing her little daughter with a horsewhip. By the way, I cannot think that a woman who took this sensual and Assyrian delight in the sight of the tears and blood of her own little helpless girl would suggest this dreadful lust to the hero at their first interview. "I should have liked living in Rome in the time of Nero; when I was in Spain I went to a bull-fight every Sunday," she confides to him; whereas such a monster would surely take the pains every one takes to efface all traces of his secret sin. Her devilishness, however, serves the purpose of bringing together in a way that would shock Mrs. Grundy into a fit, the hero and heroine. Both these characters are as convincing as they are interesting, incomparably more convincing and interesting to me than the spiritual apothecary, Dorothy, who transcends my gross apprehension. All the other characters of the story are drawn with the subtle insight you have come to expect from Mr. Marriott, while the Cornish scenes and atmosphere are rendered to picturesque perfection. You are in Cornwall also as well as in Devonshire in Mr. John Trevena's "Arminel of the West" (3), a heroine who says inadequately of herself that "she has conquered every one simply by being nice." And the "pretty low-born lass" has to conquer difficulties and prejudices of all kinds before she reaches the haven where she would be of the hero's heart. This hero is relatively, and perhaps absolutely, a poor creature, but your interest fortunately centres not in him, nor in the heroine's rival, nor in her monastic mummy of a father, nor in her heart-broken mother—all three rather incredible—but in Arminel herself, her people, and her fortunes. She is the most charming of heroines, and your absorbing interest in her dulls your pity for the misery of her ruined rival. Mr. Philip Stevenson's "A Gallant of Gascony" (4) transports you into a very different world, dealing historically, as it does, with an episode in the chequered career of Marguerite de Valois. Indeed, most of the characters and incidents in the novel are, says the author, historical, and you regret only that he did not do so much violence to history as to restore the half-hanged hero to life at the close. The stratagem of the friendly hangman ought either to have been effective or to have been untried:—

> Vex not his ghost: O let him pass; he hates him much
> That would upon the rack of this tough world
> Stretch him out longer.

If you are in the mood for a stirring story of the Dumas type you cannot do better than bury yourself in the pages of "A Gallant of Gascony." In "The Husband Hunter" (5) you are interested not so much in the attempts of a woman to catch a husband as in the scheme of a husband to capture the love of a wife who had married him for his money. You see through the husband's disguise long before his identity is guessed by Joanna March or revealed to Lady Chester. This, however, does not in the least degree diminish your enjoyment of a clever and brightly-written story in which there is much skilful character drawing.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

The publication of a book containing a selection of Mr. Gladstone's letters and papers on ecclesiastical and theological affairs will fulfil an arrangement which was made by his literary executors at the time when Mr. Morley wrote his biography. It was found that owing to the mass of material which Mr. Morley had to deal with, it would be advisable to reserve these letters and papers for separate treatment. The executors have entrusted the selection of the letters and the preparation of the explanatory narrative to Mr. D. C. Lathbury, and the book will be published by Mr. John Murray.

Mark Twain has written a book entitled, "King Leopold's Soliloquy," which will help to swell the rising flood of public indignation against that monarch's misgovernment of the Congo State. In the form of a satire, it is really a passionate plea for justice for the oppressed natives. The book, which will be published by Mr. Unwin next week, contains a preface and some supplementary matter by Mr. E. D. Morel. By the way, a new shilling edition of "Red Rubber," Mr. Morel's own powerful exposure of King Leopold's Congo atrocities, is being issued by Mr. Unwin.

In a volume on "War and the World's Life," which Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. will have ready in a week or two, Colonel F. N. Maude treats of the psychology of war. His aim is to show that as in the human body the different parts are correlated, so the relation of different parts of the national organism—army, navy, industry, etc.—must depend upon the environment of the particular country, if there is to be satisfactory power of attack and defence.

A novel entitled "The Spendthrift," which Mr. Heinemann announces, is from the pen of Miss Jessie Leckie Harbertson, whose last book, "The Stigma," was the subject of a copyright action. Another novelist was so much impressed by "The Stigma" that he boldly plagiarised a substantial part of it, the result being that the Court of Chancery granted a perpetual injunction against the further sale of his book. Miss Harbertson's new story is regarded as an exceptionally fine one, with an even more subtle piece of character-drawing than "The Stigma."

To their series of charming little volumes called "The Bibelots," admirably printed and tastefully bound in leather, Messrs. Gay and Bird have just added "Gems from Boswell" (price 2s. 6d.). A very good selection of passages from the "Life of Johnson" and the "Tour to the Hebrides" has been made by Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, but many of the notes that he has appended to them could have been spared. Boswell's gems did not need the setting of such pointless comments by Mr. Fitzgerald as, for example, "Another of his amusing confessions," or "A pleasing picture, lightly touched."

Mr. Edmund H. New's illustrations constitute a special attraction of the volume of "Poems by William Wordsworth," which has just been published by Messrs. Methuen, price 7s. 6d. net. Dr. Stopford A. Brooke, who made the selection of poems, contributes an eloquent and stimulating appreciation of Wordsworth, in which he dwells particularly upon the manner in which his poetry was influenced by the scenery of Grasmere. The inception of the present volume was, however, due to Mr. New, who had for many years cherished the idea of making a set of drawings which would form a sort of pictorial commentary to Wordsworth's verses, and represent those scenes in the English Lake country which provided the chief source of his inspiration. In the pen and ink drawings here reproduced Mr. New's always delicate, delightful art is seen at its best. The pictures fall into four groups, beginning with Cockermouth, where Wordsworth's childhood was spent; next depicting Hawkshead and the neighbourhood, the scene of his schooldays; then Grasmere, so closely associated with his early manhood; and last, Rydal, his home from 1813 till his death in 1850.

Venice has been the subject of innumerable books, but for the appearance of another there is always the excuse that it is, after all, a subject of inexhaustible interest. Certainly there was room for the charming colour-book on "Venice," written by Beryl de Sélincourt and May Sturge Henderson, and illustrated by Mr. Reginald Barratt, A.R.W.S., which has lately been published (price 10s. 6d.) by Messrs. Chatto and Windus. Mrs. de Sélincourt and Mrs. Sturge Henderson have, wisely, not attempted to give a connected history of the city, or a glorified guide-book description of its charms. They have rather chosen to dwell upon the more important epochs and characteristic aspects of Venetian history and art and to convey their own vivid impressions of the beauty and the fascination of "The Bride of the Adriatic." In doing this they have displayed not only sound knowledge, good taste, and rare insight, but a gift for eloquent writing which places the text of this volume on a far higher plane than that of the vast majority of recent colour-books. Mr. Barratt's series of thirty water-colour drawings are beautiful pictures and have been beautifully reproduced.

Mr. Mortimer Menpes and his daughter, Miss Dorothy Menpes, have been jointly responsible for several of the most successful colour-books issued by Messrs. A. and C. Black, and this happy collaboration is repeated in a new volume on "Paris" (price 6s. net). Twenty-four paintings by Mr. Menpes, admirable examples of this artist's work, are reproduced in colours, and he also contributes numerous line drawings which are interspersed through the letterpress. The latter is by Miss Menpes, who gives a vivacious and enthusiastic description of Paris and Parisian life.

Messrs T. Sealey Clark and Co. have just published the 1907 edition of "The Green Room Year Book" (price 5s.), which, though only in its second year, has already established itself in public favour as an invaluable guide to the contemporary stage. The "Who's Who" section gives condensed biographies of the leading actors, dramatists, and critics; and among various other features are a review of the dramatic year, a synopsis of London playbills (including the full casts) for 1906, lists of the new plays produced in New York, Paris, and Berlin, and a series of genealogical tables of well-known English and American theatrical families. There are also articles on dramatic criticism and other subjects of interest to every one who is interested in the stage; and in addition the book contains much useful information for managers and artists.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—London is full of tourists. I see them everywhere I go. And by what marks do I know them? you will ask. First and chiefly, I reply, by a somewhat dingy waterproof hanging on the arm. Short tourists of either sex carry long waterproofs, and long tourists carry short ones. But sometimes, even before I sight the waterproof, I note the look of concentrated worry that betrays the tourist, as of one who knows not where he shall eat his next meal. He has to put aside his interest in the sights of London and thrust aside his happiness in seeing them, to think of trains, and what motor 'buses go where, to cogitate on the marvellous difference in the price of meals at one restaurant and at another, and perhaps to bear the aching of the money nerve, suffering from having had to pay 7s. 6d. each for his own and his companion's luncheon, when he had thought it would not come to nearly half that sum for both. And the thought torments him that both of them looked completely "out of it" among the smart, with their dusty boots and faces, their rough hair and their waterproofs.

I have a fatal weakness for a grey Homburg hat. I forgive much to the tourist who wears one. I pardon nothing to him who wears a cap. Apollo himself would have looked a cad in a travelling cap of the shape I mean. It cannot help its shape, for it lives in pockets, is often sat on, is thrown at wasps and mosquitoes, is crumpled in the hands in moments of forgetfulness or of nervous agitation, and in many ways is a scapegoat for its aristocratic relative, the silk hat. The more reverent a man's attitude to the latter, the more brutal will be his behaviour to his travelling cap.

The grey Homburg hat escapes much of this ill-treatment; and how beautifully it assorts with grey hair. I seldom go out without seeing some fine old face under one of these hats, and I often wish I knew the owner. The travelled man is the cultivated man, as a rule. He is cosmopolitan and one can often read his broad-mindedness in his countenance.

Have you ever noticed how much happier are the faces of the old than of the young? A lowering discontent too often spoils the handsome looks of girls and youths. They expect too much of life, I suppose, and are in a chronic state of disappointment; whereas the elders have won through with their experiences and have learned to be contented with the present.

Or is it, do you think, that young people have not yet discovered themselves amidst the rush and jar and bustle of life, and that they feel unsettled and moody, even irritable, until they do? I think there is something in this, and should like to have your opinion. Youth has to be egoistic in a great degree, and egoism leads to discontent. Yet how can a creature avoid egoism whose whole occupation is self-education, his own career, finding his niche in the world? Elders ought to be very patient with the youngsters, yet not so patient as to let their little faults grow into large ones. And oh, how very impatient some of the old ones are with the young ones. To see it, one would think they never had been young themselves; or had entirely lost the sweet memory of their bygone youth.

"Gas can be used for warming purposes efficiently without prejudice to health."—The Lancet. A Physician says: "Every one in any way delicate should have a gas fire in their bedroom."

It is after youth is past that one is at leisure from oneself to study life and to discover how intensely interesting it is, crammed full of things that engage the attention and pique curiosity. I cannot understand how any one can ever be for a single moment dull or want to "kill time," the very worst form of killing next to murder of a fellow-creature; after good health and good friends time is our most precious possession. I suppose the persons who are bored with life are those who have allowed the little seedlings of interest in things to die down for want of cherishment. Here we are in the midst of incessant novelty, new circumstances, new acquaintance, new books, new plays, new pictures, such daily avalanches of fresh news from all over the world, that time fails us to imbibe it all. And how can any one be bored?

I often think of the words of a small daughter of one of our statesmen. When told she must go to sleep she said, "I can't make my thoughts sit down." Some people's thoughts never do sit down, while other people's hardly ever sit up. It takes all sorts to make a world.

I must snatch another moment to tell you of a lovely evening gown in very soft and lustrous cream satin, of the kind called Venus. It is half Empire shape, and is a real picture frock, with its beautiful folds and fine embroidery, its tucker of needle-run lace threaded with fine gold braid, and its softly falling panelled skirt.

And furniture! Is not furniture interesting? There are few occupations more enjoyable than turning a series of four bare walls into places of sweetness, comfort, and soft colour, where the atmosphere is agreeably congenial to such occupations as reading, writing, conversing with friends, eating, and sleeping. That we Londoners have no lack of opportunities of choice you are aware; and yet another has now been opened to us in Oxford-street. The well-known Hackney Furnishing Company has opened there a spacious furniture gallery, where series upon series of beautifully furnished rooms aid the choice of the purchaser, and stimulate his taste. The motto of the firm is said to be, "Best goods at lowest prices." This is encouraging, especially as they also pride themselves upon the quality of their workmanship and the durability of what they sell. In the basement there are immense spaces devoted to linoleum and other floor coverings, as well as a variety of miscellaneous goods. Upstairs there is drawing-room furniture, all shown upon luxurious carpets and in every possible period—Louis XVI., Empire, Chippendale, Sheraton, and all of those beautiful outlines which now so happily replace the heavy furniture of a few years since. And so on to dining-room, library, bedroom, and bathroom, with all latest ideas in fittings; and finally, still higher up, there is a huge carpet room, where the light is cleverly managed to imitate daylight, enabling the purchaser to judge effects at any hour of the day. Certainly things are made easy for us all nowadays, and there is no excuse for failure in furnishing tastefully and well. Mr. A. M. Stewart, managing director, has even organised a service of swift motors to convey purchasers from the West End house to the old-established one at Hackney.

The Duchess of Connaught will receive purses at the Rainbow bazaar, to be held at Prince's Skating Club, Knightsbridge, on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of next week. The charity to be benefited is the British Lying-in Hospital, of which many of our Royal princesses are patrons. Each stall is to have its special badge. I suppose that is why the bazaar is called "Rainbow." A cerise badge is to be worn by the ladies who assemble under the banner of the Dowager Countess of Longford to assist at the refreshment stall. Heliotrope is to be the colour at the basket, china, and pottery stall, and Constance Countess of Romney has chosen a pale green badge for the table linen and handkerchiefs that she will vend. The Marchioness of Salisbury, with a red and white badge, will sell servants' dresses, caps, aprons, and charity clothes, assisted by matrons and nurses of the hospital. Mrs. Whitelaw Reid takes charge of the American stall, which is to have fans, enamels, etc., for its wares and dark blue for its badge. Emerald-green is the very appropriate tint for that of the flower stall, and pale pink is chosen for the baby clothes and toys to be sold by Mrs. Claud Lambton. The Duchess of Somerset, assisted by the Countess of Yarborough, is to deal in sunbonnets, kimenos, soaps, sachets, scents, and the Marchioness of Tweeddale will sell sweets. Mrs. Cyril Maude undertakes stationery, books, menus, photographs, and will wear a primrose badge. The Countess of Darnley is to preside at the art stall, and Beatrice Lady Ellenborough at the advertisement counter. There is to be a fishpond under the care of the Marchioness of Hamilton. With all these attractions the bazaar should be a great success.

Is there anything that Beauty is more absolutely dependent on than the fine and perfect laundering of her clothes? In these days of diaphanous and filmy materials, of blouses that one could blow about like feathers, of lace transparencies, skirts of chiffon, ninon, lisse, and painted muslin, where would Beauty be without the finished skill that turns out all these things to absolute perfection? I wonder how many pretty women realise their indebtedness for the finish and chic of their appearance to the humble workers in soap and water, with iron and clear-starching? I thought of all this the other day when Lilla, whom I found packing for a run abroad, was admiring the exquisite laundering of some white lawn dressing-gowns, with their lace trimmings, of blouses, saut-de-lit, and fichus, which her maid was packing with infinite care and any quantity of pale pink tissue paper. I joined in her admiration and asked where her laundry is: "Such a pretty name," she said; "it is the Woodland Laundry in Park-road East, Acton. Marjorie told me about it one day when she found me in a rage over a lovely dressing-coat returned in rags and some other things not returned at all. Marjorie said that they had dealt with the Woodland for a couple of years, and that the system was so good that nothing of theirs had ever been lost in the wash. I have had great comfort with it; even lace gowns that I always used to send to the cleaner's I now send regularly to the Woodland, and they come home looking lovely."

And Lilla is rather hard to please, as you know. She showed me a pink china silk night-gown that looked like new. It had been washed seven times; and you know how fragile these garments are. One of the good things about the Woodland is that each family's things are washed separately and by hand. It sounds ideal.

I have received the following from Mona:—

My dear Madge,—The plant which you ask about, with large umbels of handsome orange or yellow flowers, is a clivia. It was formerly called an imantophyllum, in allusion to its leathery, strap-like leaves, and under that name it still appears in many horticultural catalogues. There are three species: C. Gardeni, with ten or twelve red and yellow flowers in an umbel; C. miniata, with about fifteen orange and buff; and C. nobilis, with about fifty red and yellow. All three have been introduced from South Africa. A large number of hybrids have been raised from them, and though they do not differ much from the original species, they are superior in some respects, and consequently are superseding them in gardens. The named varieties are rather expensive, but among the unnamed seedlings, which are much cheaper, will be found many not less beautiful, especially if you buy them before they have flowered in the nursery, because the best cannot then have been picked out and transferred to the named class. The plants are evergreen, a fact which adds greatly to their decorative value, whether for the conservatory or for the house. They are very easily managed. All that is necessary is to keep the foliage clean and to give them during their growing period plenty of water, occasionally with a teaspoonful of some artificial fertiliser dissolved in it. In winter, of course, they need less water, but the soil should never be quite dry. As they are seldom attacked by any insect or fungoid diseases, you will see that they give very little trouble. That they need repotting at intervals I need not say; they will insist on that themselves, for if left too long they usually burst their pots, disclosing an extraordinary mass of thick, white, fleshy roots, with no visible soil. It is not advisable, however, to disturb them more often than is absolutely necessary. Like many other plants, they flower better when they are pot-bound than they do when the roots have plenty of space. Any deficiency of soil may be made good by feeding, as I have already suggested. Clivias are much more hardy than is generally supposed. There is really no need to grow them in a warm greenhouse as is usually done, though, of course, they will there make more rapid progress than they would do under cooler conditions; but, as we have proved, they may be wintered quite safely in a cold frame—at any rate, in the southern counties—provided that the lights are covered with mats in exceptionally severe weather.

We have tried under the same conditions another group of the same family—the hippeastrums—the handsomest of the amaryllis lilies, but with them we have not been quite so successful. You know them, of course—the big bulbs half out of the soil, and the large five-petalled flowers, usually some brilliant shade of red with a stripe of white down the centre of each petal. Natives of tropical South America, they are naturally accustomed to a higher temperature than the clivias, but as many plants for which artificial heat is considered necessary can be grown without it, we thought we would experiment with some hippeastrums. As they lose their leaves in autumn, they are easily managed in winter. If the bulbs are kept dry, or nearly dry, and placed where frost cannot reach them, they are not likely to come to any harm. It is best, however, not to remove them from their pots, but to leave them in the soil until they are to be repotted in spring. It is at this time that the difficulty occurs. Without heat they are slow in starting, and if they are kept too moist, or if water lodges at the collar the bulbs are apt to decay. I do not, therefore, recommend you to try to grow them entirely in a cold house or frame, but if you can start them in heat—a hot-bed will do perfectly—they will afterwards grow there quite satisfactorily, and I am sure you will be charmed with them. By the way, the flowers appear before the leaves, so you should arrange to hide the pots either by grouping ferns or other plants around them, or by planting in them trailers, which will flower about the same time.

I know there is a prejudice among gardeners against growing two plants in the same pot, but the reason which they give—that one will starve the other—is not very sound; for different kinds of plants require different kinds of food, or—what comes to much the same thing—the same kinds in different proportions, so that they do not interfere with one another as two individuals of the same species would do. This is why the mixed border can be packed much more closely than would be possible in any single-plant bed, and it explains how the dense crowds of plants in our hedgerows manage to live. In pots, too, the soil is generally renewed every year, and while growth is proceeding the ingredients which have been abstracted from it are frequently replaced by the addition of artificial fertilisers. I do not think, therefore, that you need ever be afraid of growing two different plants in the same pot, and when the principal one is tall and rather bare at the bottom, another chosen for the purpose of covering the soil and hanging down around the pot is a very great improvement.

Don't you find it very difficult at this season to find room for all the plants that one wants to grow in the greenhouse? Bedding plants crowd the shelves, and everything else has to make way for them. It is the greatest comfort when one can move them into cold frames—and in many cases this is possible now—and there expose them to as much light and air as possible in order to harden them off. Our geraniums are already being subjected to this process. Oh, yes, many people still grow them, and very beautiful some of them are, admirable for a dry summer, though for a wet one much inferior to begonias. All the early flowers we pinch off, so that the plants may be at their best when they go into the beds. Another old-fashioned bedding plant we grow in great quantities is Gazania splendens. It has a trailing habit, and, being smothered with orange flowers throughout the summer, is charming for covering the ground between taller plants. It requires a light soil and a sunny position, but, given these conditions, it is as fine a plant of the kind as I know. Of course, it is not hardy, and it should be propagated afresh every year by means of cuttings; this is best done in August.—Your affectionate cousin,

MONA.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

DEAREST MADGE,—When it does come at long last is anything in the world better worth having waited for than a fine May day? How dainty, delicate, and altogether exquisite are the workings of Nature in the early youth of the season of beauty. Wherever Nature is at work we find ourselves in a transformed world. Not only what are commonly called "flowers" are in flower, so also are the trees and fields and hedges. Every growing thing is "a thing of beauty," even the poor things born to the sad future of a town garden, or the less ignominious fate of a suburban one, or a public park. If only we had time to look on at all the wonderful works that Nature is doing, the marvellous garments she is fashioning for the earth, in such infinite variety! But most of us are far otherwise engaged; Nature performs, as it were, to empty benches; our sex are, as a rule, too absorbed with the fashion of their own garb; more entranced and wholly taken up with the colour scheme of Paquin, etc., than with anything Nature may be showing in the wonders of colour. As for those that go down to the real country in motors, still less do they see any of its wonders. I shall never forget the contempt of a very "motorious" friend, who had made a motor "rush" through one of the most picturesque of counties, when congratulated on having seen such loveliness. "Good gracious, do you think we saw anything! Charlie has the latest thing in motors, and drives splendidly. It was as much as I could do to retain a sense of my own identity, let alone having any sense that there were mountains, lakes, fields, or moorlands anywhere

A PRICELESS SECRET.

There is a secret which is guarded more closely than the making of Bank of England Notes—it is the secret of Craven Mixture.

There is only one man alive who knows it.

Rival Manufacturers would give thousands of pounds for it, but it is a secret which money could not buy.

In Craven Mixture there are several kinds of tobacco—some of which are so precious as to be almost beyond price, and it is these tobaccos which give Craven its unequalled charm—which make it the tobacco of kings, of princes, of men of action, and men of thought the world over.

No tobacco in the world can compare with it. In taste and aroma it stands alone.

In every good tobacco shop all over the world you will find Craven Mixture. It is packed in four sizes, in patent vacuumised tins.

2oz. 1/3; 4 oz. 2/6; 8 oz. 5/-; 16 oz. 10/-.

Craven

about. Such pace! It was glorious!" The Danse Macabre of the twentieth century is indeed a very quick movement.

Whitsuntide has great possibilities as a holiday time, and not a few uncertainties when it happens to fall near the middle of May. If it's good, it is very good, but, alas! it can be very horrid. With the excellent example of Easter before it, we hoped and prepared for an amiable Whitsuntide, with the world all before us, "where to choose" a place of "rush" or rest, according to our various holiday tastes. How few is the number of those who seek recreation in anything but a change of activities. Restful holidays are less in favour each year. One cannot think that a cheap excursion for quiet wanderers, to be set down in remote places, on breezy moorlands and peaceful countrysides, would have a crowded and popular patronage. Yet what more restful and healthful to mind and body than Wordsworthian days, when the very real beauty around us would make us, with time to study it, feel the glory that was never yet "on sea or land." Only think what a thorough change a few poetic days would be for most of us. They would at least send us back to our prose with increased avidity and renewed energy if they did not put any permanent leaven of poetry into it. By the way, have you ever been in your own Lake country at the end of May? The peaceful loveliness of Windermere and Grasmere are enough to make the prosiest understand at least that poets of the Lake School could have existed, and might very well be going on still. The foliage, the bluebell woods, the sedges whispering by the lapping waters! A dream of prosperous, peaceful, English beauty. Beautiful in its characteristic English way, as Killarney in its wilder Celtic. Our holiday is over now, let us hope that it has given, one and all of us, pleasant memories

Lord and Lady Aberdeen were at the Viceregal Lodge last week. They are both very energetic in the cause of the exhibition, to which they pay frequent visits. We have supposed—not altogether unanimously perhaps—that it would be a success, and are now growing every day more sure that it will be. It is so enjoyable to combine instruction with amusement and to have mountain breezes in a pretty park so near to Dublin. But then our capital has always been renowned for what may be called the "countryness" of its immediate environs. We wonder what is to happen at the Horse Show time, with the double attractions, at Ball's Bridge. You know the exhibition and horse show grounds are close together, only the picturesque Dodder river running between. Lady Aberdeen was present during the week at the Alexandra College conference, when the Dowager Lady Dufferin was amongst other ladies who read most interesting papers on various serious subjects connected with woman's work. Formerly women were too idle to work at serious things, now it is generally found that they are too active. Golf and hockey, hunting and motoring, and so on give little time for other pursuits.

Lord and Lady Ardilaun are staying at St. Anne's, near Clontarf, where they usually stay for some weeks at this season, and give garden parties, which are the delight of their guests. Lady Ardilaun's gardens always show the latest ideas in gardening, as differing from mere gardener's gardens they may be called "My Lady's gardens."—Yours ever, CLARE.

Try this Salade à la Marie and tell me how you like it:—

Boil half a pint of green peas in salted water and strain them, turn a bunch of young carrots of an equal size, boil them in salted water about 20 minutes and strain them, finish cooking the carrots with a little white wine, adding a spoonful of white vinegar, a bouquet of herbs, including spring onions, and a small piece of butter. When the carrots are cold, dish them in a salad bowl, mixing lightly with them two tablespoonfuls of salad oil, half a teaspoonful of white vinegar, and a little salt and pepper. Season the peas in the same way, and with them make a border, sprinkle them very lightly with chopped parsley, and crown the summit with a bouquet of chervil.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

LOUNGE SUITS

Any tailor can produce a Comfortable Lounge Suit, because that is but a matter of giving plenty of room everywhere—but Comfort alone in this suit is not enough. In the making of this suit as it should be made, Comfort and Style are equally considered, and the work so done that neither the one nor the other is sacrificed to any appreciable extent.

As Mr. Bult fashions Lounge Suits, the points which make for a proper combination of Comfort and Style are most carefully dealt with, and whilst the garments are always Easy, they Fit and Hang in such a way as to give a Stylish appearance which is retained throughout hard wear. For this Season's suits Mr. Bult has stocked a very wide range of choice Materials, including the fashionable tints and mixtures in Browns and Greens and some delicate shades of Grey.

Patterns and Price List (Illustrated by Actual Photographs) will be sent Post Free on application. It should be stated for which garment the patterns are required.

Rowland's Macassar Oil FOR THE HAIR

Is the Best Preparation you can use.

WHY?

BECAUSE without it the Hair becomes dry, thin, and brittle, and this is the nearest approach to the natural oil in the Hair, the loss of which causes baldness.

BECAUSE you must keep the Hair well nourished and not too dry, or you will soon lose it.

Ladies require it to keep the Hair soft and silky.

Men require it to prevent baldness.

Children require it to lay the foundation of a Luxuriant Growth.

THE Company was formed in the year 1888, and its lines then consisted of about 273 miles of railway, running from the port of Antofagasta in a N.E. direction through some of the most important mineral and nitrate districts of Chili. In 1889 an extension from the Chilian frontier to Uyuni, Bolivia, about 105 miles in length, was carried out, and in the year 1892 the line was extended from Uyuni to Oruro, Bolivia, a distance of about 195 miles. During recent years, several branches have been constructed, so that the Company's lines now consist of about 640 miles of railway, while other branches are in course of construction. In addition to these branches, new pipe lines for water from the Cordillera mountains are being laid, on completion of which it is anticipated that the revenue of the Company will be greatly increased.

On account of the enormous increase of the traffic of the Company, the receipts from which have risen from $5,439,153 in the year 1896, to about $16,845,000 in the past year, the port of Antofagasta has proved to be quite inadequate to deal with the imports and exports carried by this line, and the port of Mejillones, to which a branch has been constructed, is now being equipped with the necessary moles and appliances to relieve the pressure at the port of Antofagasta. As soon as these arrangements have been completed, it will be possible to overcome the existing difficulty of dealing economically with the ever-growing traffic of the Railway.

In spite of the increased mileage, and the great expansion of the business of the Company during the past ten years, its Debenture Debt has only been increased by the issue of £1,000,000, in 4½ per cent. Debenture Stock, and the proceeds of the present Issue are required for the above-mentioned construction, additional rolling stock and accommodation, and the general purposes of the Railway.

The net revenue of the Company for the last three years has been as follows:—

1905	£366,055
1906	£380,000*

* The final accounts for the year are not yet to hand.

After deducting the amount required to provide interest on the 4 per cent. and 4½ per cent. Debenture Stocks from the net revenue for 1906, as stated above, there remains a balance of about £295,000, while the amount required for interest upon the present Issue will be £50,000.

A Contract dated the 16th May, 1907, has been made between the Company and Messrs. J. HENRY SCHRODER & Co., for the acquisition from the Company at par of the Debenture Stock now offered, and this Contract, together with the Trust Deed for securing the Debenture Stock, can be inspected at the Office of Messrs. HOLLAMS, SONS, COWARD & HAWKSLEY, 30, Mincing Lane, E.C.

This offer is made to existing Members and to Holders of Debenture Stocks of the Company, and those desirous of subscribing for amounts in excess of their rateable proportions can apply on the forms accompanying this offer, forwarding the amount of Deposit payable on application.

Forms of Application can be obtained from Messrs. J. HENRY SCHRODER & Co., 145, Leadenhall-street, E.C., and from Messrs. W. GREENWELL & Co., 2, Finch Lane, E.C.

RANDFONTEIN ESTATES GOLD MINING COMPANY (WITWATERSRAND) Limited.

The London Agents have received the following cable from the Head Office of the Company in Johannesburg dated 15th May, 1907:—

"Since the despatch of Directors' cable refuting statements made in connection with alleged enormous expenditure on administration fees of Randfontein Companies, the Board has received copy of Daily Mail newspaper by yesterday's mail, in which a false and misleading statement is published about the above matter. The above paper alleges that £107,044 per annum is expended on eleven Randfontein Companies for administration expenses alone, and upon this false statement certain shareholders have compiled the most misleading reports in relation to the administration charges of our companies. The true position is as follows. According to the audited details of the companies' books for the year 1906, there was expended by the Head Offices for administration charges, including Directors' and Auditors' fees and London and Paris Agencies and Transfer Office expenses, for:—

Randfontein Estates Gold Mining Company Ltd.	...	£7,499
Porges Randfontein Gold Mining Company Ltd.	...	3,901
South Randfontein Gold Mining Company Ltd.	...	3,678
North Randfontein Gold Mining Company Ltd.	...	3,523
Robinson Randfontein Gold Mining Company Ltd.	...	3,743

making a total of £22,344, instead of £32,868, as alleged, and for the West Randfontein, £2,183; East, £2,183; Ferguson, £2,184; Van Hulsteyn, £2,184; Johnstone, £2,183; Stubbs, £2,133: making a total of £13,100, instead of £74,176 as alleged. The amount, £74,176, given by the writer of the statement in question, was taken by him as representing the cost of administration for the past year, whereas, it represents the total sum expended on that account since the inception of the six companies in 1899; the cost of administration, therefore, of the eleven companies referred to is £35,444 instead of £107,044, as wrongly represented. The Directors' fees as fixed by the Articles of Association of each company of the Randfontein group are £1,200 per annum, and the total amount is used by the company for the payment of Directors' and Managing Directors' salaries, who by an agreement with the companies are not allowed to engage in any business outside the group, but are bound to devote the whole of their services to the companies' work, each Director filling a department in connection with the operations of the group, thus occupying positions for which otherwise specially paid officials would have to be appointed. In justice to our Chairman, Mr. J. B. Robinson, the Directors are bound to inform shareholders that for the last ten years he has consistently declined to draw any fees or remuneration in any shape or form from any of the companies. Being the largest shareholder in the company he has during that time ungrudgingly given his valuable services and aid, both directorial and financial, entirely gratuitously. The Robinson group expenses for 1906 were as follows:—

Porges Randfontein Gold Mining Company Ltd.	...	£3,901
South Randfontein Gold Mining Company Ltd.	...	3,678
North Randfontein Gold Mining Company Ltd.	...	3,523
Robinson Randfontein Gold Mining Company Ltd.	...	3,743

The Directors wish to draw the attention of shareholders to the fact that, as far as the published reports of the other groups of mines are concerned, it would appear that their administration expenditure is higher than that connected with the Randfontein Group of Mines.

"With regard to our eight non-producing companies, the average head office (or administration) expenditure for 1906 was £2,236 each; the Directors have further to draw the attention of shareholders to the fact that the head office (or administration) expenses are given in the Managing Directors' report of each of our producing companies accompanying the annual reports now in the hands of Shareholders.

"The statements published by the Daily Mail to the effect that the administration expenses of the Randfontein Group amounted to £107,044 has brought about an agitation amongst the shareholders of the company, and in consequence of that statement of the Daily Mail the Directors are receiving by every mail, from shareholders, abusive and scurrilous letters about the appropriation of this vast sum of money: the Daily Mail statement is libellous, and a cruel injustice to Directors, who will deal as soon as possible in another form with the authors and publishers of the statement. It is quite evident that the success of the Randfontein Group of Mines in obtaining a large supply of native labour, and in starting eight new mines, has caused a good deal of resentment to those who do not wish to see any new mines opened and worked at the present time, and who are actuated by sinister motives in respect to these matters. So successful have been the efforts of the Randfontein Group in the recruitment of natives, that were all the Chinese on the Rand repatriated at once, there would be no difficulty in replacing them by natives: the Randfontein Group alone have been offered about 30,000 natives from the Cape Colony, and about 20,000 more from the different districts in the Transvaal; this is exclusive of the large number of natives which have been offered to the other mines; it also excludes that large field for native recruitment in Portuguese East Africa.

"It was stated here in a newspaper a few days ago that the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association had relaxed its efforts in the recruitment of natives on account of the large supply now being offered to the mines.

"The Directors of the Randfontein Group have done their utmost to advance the prosperity of the companies, the Chairman, Mr. J. B. Robinson, having during the four months he has been on the fields exerted himself day and night to assist the companies financially, in obtaining labour, and in starting the mines for the good of the Shareholders, and thereby giving employment to those who were on the verge of starvation: he has also offered to assist the Group with £1,000,000, so as to bring the eight companies as soon as possible to a producing stage, and thus establish within the very short period of two years the value of the property, the moment being most favourable, as both the Chairman and the Vice-Chairman, Mr. J. W. S. Langerman, had successfully used their best efforts to bring labour to the mines; the strain which Mr. Langerman has undergone during the last few years in his anxiety to obtain labour, and to assist in the development of the mines, has seriously injured his health in the discharge of his duties.

"The Directors have now shown that the total expenditure for the year of the Randfontein subsidiaries, including Randfontein Estates Gold Mining Company, Limited, referred to by the Daily Mail, does not exceed £35,444; they have also shown that the Directors' fees only amount to £1,200 per annum, and that these fees are used to pay salaries to men who are engaged to devote their whole time to the companies' affairs, so as to avoid engaging other officials to do the work.

"The Directors having now proved the falsity of the statements made by these men, they feel that the publicity which has been given to these statements in the press, and cabled to the newspapers in this country, compel them to take action without further delay. In the present disturbed conditions prevailing amongst the workmen on the mines, as well as the important questions of labour and financial assistance for the Randfontein Group of Mines, these systematic and unfaithful attacks by a cabal, aided by a certain section of the press, cannot possibly conduce to the welfare of the companies, and they realise that through these unscrupulous attacks their efforts to protect the interests of the companies in the critical times will be seriously weakened and that instead of having their hands strengthened in carrying out the good work they are doing, they are being undermined.

"This action is to a great extent unsettling the minds of the staff and workmen at the mines, and the result must have a serious effect on the future of the Randfontein properties; the Directors have, therefore, resolved to close down at once the eight new companies at Randfontein on which a considerable amount of work has already been done, and a large amount of money expended in connection therewith, and to discharge the white employees, as well as the natives who have been engaged on the work at these mines, in order to meet the wishes of shareholders who, according to the cabled statements from London to the local papers, demand that the cash of the companies shall be paid out to them as dividends; the Directors will therefore proceed to distribute the surplus assets to the shareholders, and have resolved to retire from the Boards of the companies as soon as the above measures have been carried into effect, as they feel that they cannot longer be associated with those shareholders who by their unjustifiable attitude have opposed the policy which has been inaugurated by the Board for the speedy development and equipment of all the subsidiary mines on the Randfontein Estates Gold Mining Company Limited property, and bringing them to a producing stage; there is no doubt that this opposition to the Board's policy is destructive, and has completely upset the financial arrangements the Board had in view to carry out the above work for the purpose of enabling the Randfontein Companies to produce about 75,000 ounces of gold per month within two years; shareholders would then have received satisfactory cash dividends, and would have been highly gratified at the value their properties had attained through the foresight which has been shown in the management and control of the Randfontein Group of Mines."

LETTERS FROM CELEBRITIES.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET ON NERVOUSNESS.

"Industrial Farm Colony,
"Duxhurst,
"April, 1907.

"DEAR FRIEND,—Your letter is one of many which I constantly receive begging me to tell of something which can help to restore tired nerves and over-worn strength, and you ask me to do so because I come in contact with so many who for these very reasons fail in the race of life, having sought the wrong remedy for such loss of nerve-power.

"The description which you give me of your difficulty scarcely varies from that of which I am so often told. Work has become a drudgery, and life a heavy thing. You tell me that you go to bed feeling tired, and that you wake in the morning almost equally tired, that your food is distasteful to you, and that little things which used to sit lightly upon you have become heavy burdens; that even pleasure is toil. I know you have worked hard through many years, and have had much mental strain. This may in a measure account for your weakness, which is not brought about by any condition of actual disease, but which seems to arise from an even greater trouble—namely, that your nerve-force is seriously overspent.

"It is important to understand that in these days of worry and over-excitement, the over-work (mental and physical) to which most of us are subject calls forth an undue expenditure of strength, and that to recuperate the vigour we have lost we must consider what sort of food or remedy we require.

"Of course, the whole question of proper nourishment requires much thought and experience. Many forms of food and many restoratives are recommended, but having had to do with a great many people who have impaired their digestive organs and whose nerve-power has been seriously undermined, I do not think that I have come across anything which I believe a more suitable nutrient for all forms of weakness than Sanatogen. I do not know if you have tried it, but it seems to me, under the conditions such as you have described, an ideal preparation, because it provides a valuable tonic-food in the most suitable form. It consists, I believe, in the nourishing element of pure cows' milk, incorporated with which is a special nerve-tonic containing phosphorus. It has an invigorating power on worn-out nerves, and gives tone to exhausted tissues to a surprising extent. The feeblest system and the poorest digestive organs are able to assimilate it when they can really touch little else. I am strongly of opinion that you cannot do better than begin a course of Sanatogen if you wish to regain your strength.

"Sanatogen undoubtedly restores sleep and invigorates the nerves, and it braces the patient to health, for I have noticed that with the restoration of the digestive organs the mind becomes more quickly active, and work, both mental and physical, becomes more easy, and the freshness and keenness which such people have lost (apparently altogether) return gradually, and bring with them an enjoyment of life and a feeling of hopefulness not hitherto experienced.

"When the body is subjected to a course of Sanatogen the blood condition improves, the skin assumes a more healthy colour, the invigorated nerves are braced to a more healthy tone, and the whole human machinery is made fit for exercise and work and for fulfilling its functions in the most perfect manner. . . . .

NOTICE.

Owing to an error, for which I do not know whether the Puzzle Editor or that broad-shouldered individual, the printer, is responsible, the Puzzle announced in TRUTH of May 1st was wrongly numbered as 1,476 instead of 1,475; this error was perpetrated in TRUTH of May 8th, where the Puzzle was numbered 1,477 instead of 1,476: but in TRUTH of May 15th the correct numbering was reverted to, with the result that there appeared to be Two Puzzles (viz., those of May 8th and May 15th) numbered 1,477.

To make the matter quite clear I append the numbers as they should have been printed, from May 1st to May 15th, viz.:—

IMPORTANT.

I was talking a few days ago to a friend of mine who is connected with the Great Eastern Railway Company and is also, like a wise man, a regular reader of TRUTH.

The conversation happened to turn upon our weekly Puzzles, and my friend said to me, half in jest, "By the way, some of those Competitors of yours are uncommonly ingenious. I wish you'd put them on to devise some appropriate catch name for our new vestibule corridor luncheon car service of trains which we shall be inaugurating in July, between London and the Norfolk Coast towns – including Cromer, Sheringham, Mundesley and Overstrand. At present, the united brains of the Company's staff can invent nothing better than the somewhat hum-drum title 'Norfolk Coast Express.'"

"Well now," I answered, "I really think that would make rather a popular Puzzle, and I've more than half a mind to act on your suggestion. But," I added meaningly, "if your Company want to pick the brains of our Competitors, it seems to me that they ought to offer some quid pro quo."

My friend laughed.

"Oh! That's reasonable enough," he replied. "What is the value of your usual weekly prize. Two Guineas, is it not?"

I answered in the affirmative.

"All right, then," said he, "We'll add another Two Guineas to it, for the best catch-name sent in, conditionally upon its being sufficiently good for the Company to adopt."

In the interests of my Competitors, I thought his offer too good to be refused, so I at once closed with it.

I am, therefore, in the position this week to offer A SPECIAL PRIZE OF TWO GUINEAS from the Great Eastern Railway Company, in addition to the usual Two Guineas presented by TRUTH, to that Competitor who shall send in

THE NEATEST AND MOST ATTRACTIVE CATCH-NAME FOR THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S NEW VESTIBULE CORRIDOR LUNCHEON CAR EXPRESS, WHICH WILL START RUNNING IN JULY NEXT BETWEEN LONDON AND THE NORFOLK COAST TOWNS, INCLUDING CROMER, SHERINGHAM, MUNDESLEY AND OVERSTRAND.

To preclude any possible misapprehension, let me make it clear that, while TRUTH'S usual Prize of Two Guineas will be given in any event, the extra Two Guineas offered by the Great Eastern Railway Company will only be awarded if the best catch-name sent in is adjudged by the Company good enough for them to adopt.

For the benefit of Competitors, I append herewith particulars of the aforesaid service:—

DOWN SERVICE.

		P.M.
Liverpool Street	dep.	1 30
Cromer	arr.	4 25

Competitors are not limited to any length of Catch-name, but they are reminded that, other things being equal, the shorter the name, the more effective it will necessarily be.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i.) Every Competitor may send in four, but not more than four, Catch-names.

(ii.) All lists of Catch names must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, June 3rd, at latest.

Have the pleasure of introducing to the Public their NEW FOOD

TILIA

This preparation is, it is confidently believed, destined to take premier rank as an article of diet and nourishment, and represents an emphatic advance upon all other preparations which have their origin in cow's milk.

Scientific investigation has shown that much of the food which is largely consumed to-day is greatly lacking in nourishing and flesh-forming constituents, and the need for some preparation which would either take the place of these foods, or supply the nourishment which they lack, has become urgent. TILIA supplies this need.

TILIA is a powder—odourless, tasteless—which embodies the albumen of pure fresh milk. The beneficial properties of milk albumen as a food product are well known, and taken in sufficient quantities, pure milk is, as nearly as possible, a perfect food.

TILIA

is absolutely pure, perfectly soluble, and highly digestible.

TILIA increases the nourishing properties of any food to which it is added.

TILIA is sold in three forms:—Powder, Cocoa, and Biscuits.

TILIA Cocoa is very delicious, and is immensely superior to all ordinary cocoas, because it is far more nourishing.

TILIA Biscuits are so nutritious that one Tilia biscuit is more nourishing than several ordinary biscuits of the same size.

TILIA PREPARATIONS are sold by Grocers and Stores throughout the United Kingdom at the following prices:—

TILIA Powder, in airtight tins,		9d., 1s. 4d. and 2s. 6d.
TILIA Cocoa	„ „	9d., 1s. 4d. and 2s. 6d.

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1587. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, May 29, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, *which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. ENTRE NOUS.

It was stated in Truth last week that the King's long arranged visit to Lord and Lady Lansdowne at Bowood Park is to take place in July. It is now settled that the King is to be accompanied to Bowood by the Queen, and their Majesties will stay there from Saturday, July 20, until Monday, the 22nd. The King and Queen are to travel on the Saturday afternoon by special Royal train from Paddington to Chippenham, whence they will drive to Bowood, entering the park by the gilt gates at the handsome arched lodge and tower which were designed by Barry, from which there is a beautiful drive of nearly two miles to the house through rich woods. The King and Queen are to occupy apartments on the south side of the house, from which there is a lovely view over the terraced gardens of the lake and the miles of woods, with the Wiltshire Downs beyond.

The Levee which the King is to hold at St. James's Palace next Monday will be a very full one, and a large attendance of the Corps Diplomatique is expected.

The King left Reigate Priory last Wednesday for Windsor, where his Majesty went over the Castle and walked through the gardens, after which he lunched at Frogmore with the Prince and Princess of Wales and returned to town later in the afternoon. The King left Buckingham Palace on Thursday for Sandringham, and came back to town on Monday. This is the first visit for several years which the King has paid to Sandringham during the late spring or summer. His Majesty will not leave town again until Monday, June 17, when the Court will remove for a week to Windsor Castle.

The Pall Mall Gazette was altogether wrong in announcing that the King's visit to Reigate Priory "is an honour which Captain and Mrs. Greville have not been accorded before." The King had previously paid three week-end visits during the last three summers to Captain and Mrs. Greville at Reigate Priory. Last year his Majesty was their guest during the last few days of the Whitsuntide holidays. This will be the King's last visit to Reigate Priory, as Captain and Mrs. Greville will terminate their tenancy in August, when they are to remove to Polesden Lacey, near Dorking, a large and picturesque domain which they have purchased from the executors of the late Sir Clinton Dawkins.

There is no truth whatever in the statement, copied by the morning papers of Friday from a Spanish journal, that the King contemplates building a château at Villagarcia, on the coast of Galicia, which is in future to be his Majesty's residence for several weeks every spring, "instead of Biarritz." It is added that the King of Spain is also to build a château at Villagarcia as a spring residence. It is amazing that the daily papers can complacently reprint such cock-and-bull nonsense. The King has no more intention of building, or purchasing, or renting, a residence at Villagarcia, or anywhere else in Spain, than he has of erecting a palace at Pekin or San Francisco.

The Victoria and Albert encountered very rough weather after leaving Corfu for Gibraltar, and the Queen abandoned her intention of returning to Portsmouth by sea, and landed from the Royal yacht at Naples on the afternoon of Tuesday, the 21st. Her Majesty and Princess Victoria made brief halts at Rome and at Florence, whence they travelled direct to Paris by the Simplon Tunnel route, and they arrived at the Hôtel

Bristol on Sunday evening. The Queen has been absent from England between seven and eight weeks.

It has been settled that the King and Queen of Denmark are to land at Portsmouth when they arrive in England on Saturday, June 8, and they will embark at Flushing the previous day on board the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, which vessel is to be met at Spithead by the Channel Fleet. King Frederick and Queen Louise are to land at the south railway jetty, where they will be received by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the Royal party will travel by special train from the Harbour Station to Victoria, where the King and Queen are to meet their guests on the platform. The King and Queen of Denmark will embark at Portsmouth on Thursday, June 13, for Cherbourg.

The Prince and Princess of Wales have returned to Marlborough House from Frogmore Lodge, where they will again be in residence from June 17 till the 24th. The Princess goes abroad at the end of July, to spend about five weeks in Germany and Switzerland.

Princess Henry of Battenberg has changed her plans, having decided to return to England for a short time before going to Germany. Princess Henry will not now go to Germany until after Ascot race week, during which she is to be the guest of Prince and Princess Christian at Cumberland Lodge.

The Royal Counties Agricultural Show, which is being held this week at Maidenhead, under the presidency of Colonel Van de Weyer, is to be visited tomorrow by the Duke of Connaught and Prince Christian.

Princess Louise was received with great enthusiasm in the West Riding of Yorkshire last week. Her Royal Highness and the Duke of Argyll were the guests of Sir George and Lady Armytage at Kirklees Park from Tuesday evening until Thursday night, when they left for Scotland. On Wednesday the Princess opened a new Art Gallery which has been presented to the inhabitants of Brighouse by the present Mayor of that town, and on Thursday she paid a visit to Woodsome Hall, Lord Dartmouth's Yorkshire seat (now occupied by Lady Frances Legge), which is one of the most delightful old places in the county.

The Empress Eugénie, who has been residing on the Riviera for nearly five months, at the Villa Cyrnos, is expected to return to England early next month. The Empress will make a short stay at Farnborough Hill, after which she is going for a two months' cruise to Norway and the Baltic in her steam yacht Thistle, which is now fitting out at Cowes.

If I were a Sovereign, or a Royal Prince, I should keep clear of England. Even if I were eminent in any walk of life, I should do the same, unless I could pay my visit without being what the newspapers call "our guest." The so-called guest is worried to death by our hospitality, and if he goes out, he is dogged by the interviewer and the snap-shotter. Every sort of official body of men consider that they ought to do him honour by a repast, and even still more desirous of his presence at a repast are all the numerous political and social associations in search of an advertisement. At these feasts of food and unreason, the unfortunate victim is expected to make a speech reciprocating our kindness by a few well-turned platitudes, in which he vows that his country will rejoice to hear that they are honoured in him, and winding up with a few phrases which are intended to convey to us that never was, since the commencement of the world, a nation so wise, so noble, and so admirable as we.

I know, I am bound to confess, very little respecting Prince Fushimi. I have no doubt that he is an intelligent and patriotic Japanese Royal Highness. But I have been much bored myself during his visit by being unable to take up a newspaper without seeing the columns that are devoted in it to him. What "our guest," as he is termed in journalese, thinks on every sort of subject, and what he does, obtrudes itself on my eyes. I feel, however, that I have no right to complain, seeing that he must be himself bored by the attentions paid to him far more than by finding them paraded in every paper.

The late Lord de Ros was to have been the Gold Stick in Waiting on the King during this month, but there has been no Court ceremonial at which the attendance of the members of his Majesty's military household was required. It is the first time for a great number of years that May has been an absolutely blank month at Court, but there will be plenty of duty during June. Lord Dundonald, the new Colonel of the 2nd Life Guards, is to be the Gold Stick in Waiting during June, with Lieutenant-Colonel Ferguson, 2nd Life Guards, as the Silver Stick on duty, and Lieutenant-Colonel Erskine, 1st Scots Guards, as the Field Officer in Brigade Waiting. They will all be in attendance on the King at the Levee which is to be held by his Majesty at St. James's Palace on Monday afternoon, and at the Court which their Majesties will hold at Buckingham Palace on Thursday night..

The King and Queen have promised to attend the concert and gymnastic display which will be given at the Albert Hall next Monday afternoon by the students of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind. It is to be hoped that this entertainment will be not only a great success in itself, but that it will help to direct more attention to the importance and value of the work which is being accomplished by this institution for the blind. How important and valuable it is may be judged from the fact that between eighty and ninety per cent. of the College graduates are now earning their own living as the result of the training received at the College.

A correspondent writes:—

The World contains a letter from a writer who signs herself "Belle," and who certainly cannot be congratulated on the correctness of her social intelligence.

"Lord and Lady Lansdowne have gone to Bowood." They had really gone to stay with their daughter and son-in-law at Holker Hall, Lancashire.

"Lord and Lady Salisbury have gone to Hatfield, where they have a large family party." Lord Salisbury has been staying at the seaside, and Lady Salisbury went abroad for the holidays.

"Lord and Lady Desborough are at Taplow." Lord Desborough has gone abroad for a short time, and Lady Desborough spent Whitsuntide at Newquay.

"Lord Cadogan is selling all his horses, and is giving up racing altogether. He has just come back to England." Lord Cadogan returned to England several weeks ago, and his racehorses were sold at Newmarket just a month ago.

The Daily Mail last week reported the presence of Prince Arthur of Connaught at the opera, when he was really at Madrid. Another journal included the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire among the company at the opera, whereas they were in Ireland. The Duchess was announced by a weekly paper to be at Newmarket a week after she had gone to Lismore.

THE CULT OF THE BEARD.

They say the beard is coming in,
And grieved I am to hear it;
So little hirsute is my chin,
'Tis odds I'd never rear it;
Or if I could the appendage win,
'Twould take twelve months, or near it.

And while those dreadful twelve months ran
Their tedious daily races—
Why, troth, the unkempt vagrant man,
Who sleeps in open spaces,
Presents a visage spick and span
Compared with what my face is.

The dame whose scalp is bald till comes
Her head of hair from Truefitt's,
The wretch who chews his toothless gums
And 'waits his dental new fits,
May feel a woe, you'd think, that plumbs
The lowest depths of blue fits.

Not so. Sensations far, far worse
Await the hapless toff, sir,
Who (victim he of fashion's curse,
While all his people scoff, sir),
Lies low in dark back rooms to nurse
The beard that won't come off, sir.

Sir Benjamin Baker, who died suddenly last week, was an engineer of the greatest eminence. He was associated for many years with the late Sir John Fowler. Two of the most important undertakings achieved with complete success by Sir Benjamin Baker were the Forth Bridge and the dam across the Nile at Assouan. He was responsible for many other notable works, both at home and abroad, including Blackfriars Bridge, and he was employed to repair and strengthen Telford's famous suspension bridge over the Menai Straits. Sir John Baker was the author of several most valuable works relating to professional questions. He was a man of boundless energy, and his enterprise was well drenched with common sense. He invented the pneumatic shield, which is literally invaluable when constructing tubes or tunnels.

Sir Joseph Fayrer, who died at Falmouth last week, was officially employed at Lucknow during the Mutiny, and he rendered most valuable services to the refugees in the Residency during the siege. He worked for many years with conspicuous zeal and ability in the Bengal Medical Service. Sir Joseph was selected to attend the King (then Prince of Wales) during his tour through India in 1875. He was the author of an elaborate work on the venomous snakes of India, the result of many years of laborious investigations, which he presented to the Indian Government on condition that the book should be extensively circulated throughout the country.

Lord Young was certainly a link with the past, for he was born during the reign of George III., and he was in large practice at the Scotch Bar before the deaths of Jeffreys in 1850, and of Cockburn in 1854. He was a man of enormous ability and untiring industry, with an intellect of rare acuteness, but more distinguished for the fortiter in re than for the suaviter in modo, and was conspicuous in the Edinburgh Parliament House for over half a century by his scathing and mordant wit, which spared nobody. He was certainly feared by most of the judges, his colleagues, and also by the members of the Bar, with a very few exceptions, for he was ruthless in his criticisms. It was universally recognised, however, that he was an admirable judge, and he despatched the business of his court with a rapidity which electrified Edinburgh. He detested useless formalities, and sternly crushed the irrelevances and delays which are traditional in Scotch legal procedure. His mind was saturated with strong, shrewd common sense, and his judgments were often regarded as unconventional, but they were scarcely ever reversed. He was frequently in a minority in his division of the Court of Session, but his opinion was nearly always adopted by the House of Lords. It was well said of Lord Young some years ago that he had never suffered fools gladly, and he certainly never omitted an opportunity of inflicting a salutary and smashing snub.

Lord Young became Solicitor-General for Scotland in 1862, and he served under Lord Palmerston and Lord Russell, and for a short time under Mr. Gladstone. He succeeded the late Lord Moncrieff as Lord Advocate in the autumn of 1869, and held that office until his promotion to the Bench, which took place in February, 1874, just before Mr. Gladstone went out of office. He sat in Parliament as Member for the Wigton Burghs from 1865 until 1874, and he highly distinguished himself in the House of Commons on several occasions. He was all his life a staunch Liberal. Lord Young shared in the political ill-luck which has been the fate of most Liberal lawyers in Scotland. He was far and away the most eminent of the judges of the Court of Session, but it fell to the Tories to fill the offices of Lord President and of Lord Justice Clerk, and, of course, they promoted their own men. It must have been most exasperating for Lord Young to find men who were notoriously inferior to him in ability and legal power elevated over his head. If he has left Reminiscences, they will be as entertaining as the famous Memorials of Lord Cockburn.

Sir Thomas Woolaston White, who died last week at Scarborough, where he had resided for several years, was the head of a family which has been settled for some four centuries in Notts. The manor of Tuxford was purchased by Thomas White during the reign of Henry VIII. Mr. Thomas White, of Wallingwells, near Worksop, was created a baronet in 1802. Sir Thomas served for twenty-five years in the 16th Lancers, retiring in 1872 with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. The title and estates pass to his nephew.

Mr. Finch, who died last Wednesday, after a very short illness, had been the Father of the House of Commons since the General Election, a position in which he is succeeded by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, who has sat for Stirling Burghs since December, 1868. Mr. Finch was returned for Rutlandshire at a by-election in 1867, in the place of the present Lord Ancaster, who had vacated his seat on succeeding his father in the Barony of Aveland. Lord Ancaster was himself returned for Rutlandshire in 1856, when a peerage was conferred by Lord Palmerston upon his father, who had then sat for the county for thirty-six years. Mr. Finch was most regular in his attendance at the House, and the Tory Whips could always count confidently upon his vote. He scarcely ever spoke, and rarely asked a question; but he was an excellent working Member, and rendered valuable public service on Committees.

Very large estates in Rutlandshire, Lincolnshire, and Northamptonshire, which formerly appertained to the Earldom of Winchilsea and Nottingham, were owned by Mr. Finch. He was a most generous and considerate landlord, and he was held in the highest esteem by all classes in the counties with which he was connected. He had taken an active part in local affairs for nearly half a century, and was warmly interested in many charitable institutions. His unexpected death is profoundly regretted in Rutlandshire, where he had spent the greater part of his life.

Mr. Finch was the owner of the magnificent domain of Burley-on-the-Hill, near Oakham, one of the largest and most conspicuous country houses in the Midland Counties. A squadron of cavalry could be accommodated in the immense stables. The Palladian house, which was built towards the close of the seventeenth century, is remarkable only for its vast extent and its curious colonnade quadrants which project from the front. It contains some valuable tapestry and a few interesting portraits. The park of 1,000 acres is finely wooded, many of the trees being remarkable for age and size. Burley was owned by "Steenie," Duke of Buckingham, who built a house which was demolished during the Civil War. The estate was sold by Charles, the second Duke of Buckingham, to Daniel Finch, Earl of Nottingham, who built the present house.

The most remarkable feature of the Sedelmeyer sale in Paris has been the high prices obtained for the works of Sir Henry Raeburn. The portrait of Mr. James Monteith, which realised £5,200, had cost its late owner £2,500. The portrait of Mrs. Pattison, of Kelvin Grove, fetched £4,480, having been sold at Edinburgh only three years ago for £2,730. The group of Colonel Ramsey and his wife sold for £4,280, having been officially valued just before the sale at £3,200. It is curious to recall the paltry prices which were obtained at the great sale of Raeburn's portraits in 1877, when forty-nine works realised only £4,700. The Lady Raeburn, which sold two years ago for 8,700 gs., then fetched only 950 gs.

I was rather surprised to see the reference in last week's Truth to the "Ajax Dry Cell" and the British Electric Institute, having only a few days previously noticed an advertisement of the firm in the columns of the Times. Surely there must be something wrong somewhere when a firm which figures in the Truth Cautionary List is able to obtain an insertion of its advertisements in the leading journal.

Yes; I should say there is something very wrong somewhere. I fear, however, that there is little room in these days for my correspondent's surprise. Time was when, if I found fault with one newspaper for publishing advertisements which had been the subject of Truth exposures, I was able to point to the columns of the Times as an example of the standard to which the press in general should conform. But that state of things has become very much a matter of ancient history.

It would really seem that in the matter of advertisements the managers of some Indian newspapers stick at nothing. In one page of the Civil and Military Gazette for April 16, there appears (1) a seductive advertisement of the Dr. Sanden belt swindle, specially addressed to "Society Ladies"; (2) an announcement of Cunliffe, Russell and Co., the Paris dealers in Continental lottery bonds; and (3) half a column devoted to the notorious Dr. Kidd, of Fort Wayne, Indiana, who heads his advertisement "Free! Free! to the sick and ailing everywhere," and is in reality one of the most rapacious of the harpies who prey upon suffering humanity. At the foot of Kidd's advertisement is this notification:—

Note.—We know personally Dr. Kidd, and know that his methods and his offer are exactly as represented in every respect. Our readers should take advantage of Dr. Kidd's generous offer.

This is obviously intended as an editorial endorsement of all the humbug in the body of the advertisement. There is no point in it except on that assumption; and it is incomprehensible how any journal which professes to be respectably conducted can allow such a paragraph to appear in its pages.

The season has arrived when business firms are pestered with requests for subscriptions towards the annual excursions of the employees of other firms with which they do business. I have received one or two such circulars during the past week or two from firms which resent these applications. Here is a good specimen:—

DEAR SIR,—The employees of Mr. W. Nash, builder, etc., Kensington, propose going to Eastbourne this year for their annual excursion.

We take this opportunity of thanking you for your contributions of past years, and hope you will favour us on this occasion with a subscription.—Yours faithfully,

If an employer allows his name to be used when his employees are touting in this way, I suppose the men cannot be blamed. But there are other objections to the practice besides its impudence; and seeing how strongly many firms object to it, I wonder that a combined stand has not been made against it.

A REVOLUTIONARY SUGGESTION.

(In Defiance of Natural History.)

The maidens say, though they'll meet half-way
The bachelor who's wishing
To take, for life, to himself a wife—
Yet the man must do the fishing.

Which seems to me as absurd to be,
As if you should ask the dace, sir,
His luck to try with the rod and fly
On bipeds of human race, sir.

For man was aye the finny prey,
And woman, the fair entangler—
In every part of the gentle art
As compleat as Walton's Angler.

Whatever view one may take of the living statue business at London music halls, I should think there can be no doubt as to the extreme undesirability of such exhibitions by European women in India. An Anglo-Indian correspondent sends me a letter animadverting in strong terms on the inclusion of an item of this description in the programme of a theatre at Calcutta. The importance of maintaining the prestige of the ruling race is constantly affirmed; "but," my correspondent asks, "what respect can the natives have for that race when women belonging to it are permitted to show themselves practically in a nude condition on a public stage?" There is a good deal of force in this, and it is rather surprising that the authorities at Calcutta have not prohibited the entertainment.

Before the current number of the Nineteenth Century is out of print, I would recommend every one who is interested in what is known as the Education Question—the question of the degree and character of religious instruction to be given to children—to read the article of Mr. Havelock Ellis on "Religion and the Child." It has been often said in these columns that the only religion which is worth anything to a man cannot be acquired before the threshold of manhood is reached; that whether this or that theological dogma shall be taught to children under fourteen years of age is a matter of no consequence to the children or anybody else, unless on the ground that it might be better to teach none; and that in wrangling over this question and neglecting altogether the spiritual welfare of the same children after they have reached the age of fourteen, the sects and Churches sacrifice the substance for the shadow. Mr. Havelock Ellis shows why this is so. His argument rests upon observation of the ideas of children and the psychological conditions of childhood; and I do not believe that his conclusions will be disputed by any one who understands children and is at the same time capable of approaching the question without religious bias or conventional prejudice.

A right understanding of this matter is of the utmost importance, for it touches the education of all children, and not merely those in public elementary schools. One of the most momentous points that Mr. Ellis raises is that the effect of making religion—in forms which only appeal to adult intelligence and emotion—a part of scholastic routine is likely to be the opposite of that intended. He combats the conventional view that children can be inoculated with ideas and beliefs that will be of value to them in after life, though they may not understand them at the time. Here are one or two suggestive extracts from this passage for the benefit of those who may not have the whole article within reach:—

The usual effect of constantly imparting to children an instruction they are not yet ready to receive is to deaden their sensibilities to the whole subject of religion. The premature familiarity with religious influences—putting aside the rare cases where it induces a morbid pre-occupation with religion—induces a reaction of routine which becomes so habitual that it successfully withstands the later influences which on more virgin soil would have evoked vigorous and living response. . . . The commonplace child in later life accepts the religion it has been inured to so early as part of the conventional routine of life. The more vigorous and original child, for the same reason, shakes it off, perhaps, for ever. . . . There are few among us who have not suffered from this too early familiarity with the Bible and the conception of religion. . . . For the majority the religious education of the school as effectually seals the Bible for life as the classical education of the college seals the great authors of Greece and Rome for life; no man opens his school-books again when he has once left school.

All this explains why the Bible is a book which everybody reverences and nobody reads—unless as a pious exercise. Also why the millions of working-class children educated in Church schools and Sunday schools grow up professing Christians and virtual heathens. Also, no doubt, why clergymen's sons are more ready to go to the devil than the sons of laymen.

The Bishop of Stepney is to be the Canon-in-residence and Sunday afternoon preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral during June, replacing Canon Holland, who has been on duty since May 1.

The Lord Chancellor has presented the Rev. E. C. Kirwan, vicar of York Town and Camberley, and chaplain of the Staff College, to the rectory of Guildford, vacant by the resignation of Canon Grant. Mr. Kirwan, who was formerly curate of Guildford, is to be instituted to the benefice on July 10 by the Bishop of Winchester.

Father Taunton, who died suddenly in London the other day, was distinguished among the English Roman Catholic clergy for his varied and profound learning and his wide knowledge of Church music, on which he was an eminent authority. He had written some valuable historical works, and was a recognised authority on Canon Law. Father Taunton, who was beloved and esteemed by all who knew him, was an enthusiastic admirer of the Benedictine Order.

Canon Hervey would be amazed to read in a weekly contemporary last week that he is the author of the well-known hymn, "The roseate hues of early morn." He might just as reasonably have been credited with the authorship of "Scenes of Clerical Life." The hymn in question was written by the late Mrs. Alexander, wife of the Archbishop of Armagh. The same paper is also wildly astray in its statement that Canon Hervey is the composer of "the well-known Funeral Service which is always used in St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey." At funerals in these churches "the well-known Service" of Croft and Purcell is used, and has been used for a very long time past.

Archdeacon Bevan is to be succeeded in the Archdeaconry of Brecon by his son, the Rev. E. L. Bevan, Vicar of Brecon, on the nomination of the Bishop of St. David's. The stipend is £400 a year. Archdeacon Bevan, who has resigned this office, has been working in the diocese of St. David's for upwards of sixty years.

Although I was assured the other day by one claiming to know all about Canterbury that the Dean's arrangements in regard to the Cathedral services are received with universal approval, a petition has just been presented to the Dean by nearly 300 of the congregation asking for some curtailment of the Sunday morning service. It is considered that a service lasting from 10.30 till 12.30, or, with the Communion Service, till 1.15, exceeds reasonable limits, an opinion which I should strongly share if I were called on to attend. This abundant measure of public worship is due to the inclusion of the Litany, Ante-Communion Service, and sermon, and what is desired is a return to the arrangement which prevailed under Dean Farrar of taking the first two items on alternate Sundays. The opinion also prevails that, probably with reason, the dimensions of sermons might be reduced with advantage. But this grievance is not peculiar to Canterbury.

There are evidently no bounds to the impudence of the Rev. Joseph Geoghegan, the organiser of the Roman Catholic lottery at Phibsboro', Dublin, which has already come under notice in Truth and also in the House of Commons. He is now inviting police officers in England to sell tickets for the lottery. The chief constable of a county has forwarded to me a circular and batch of tickets which he received from the reverend gentleman a few days ago. The envelope was directed to "The Chief Constable," so that it was not sent in ignorance of his position, and similar packets have been posted from Dublin to practically the whole of the members of the constabulary in the same county. No doubt other counties have been or will be similarly favoured. Mr. Geoghegan must know perfectly well that the sale of lottery tickets in this country is illegal; but, nevertheless, he coolly asks police officers to engage in this illegal practice, offering as an inducement a commission of one shilling, together with one complimentary ticket for every ten tickets disposed of. The same commission is also offered to "the foremen" at factories who, as I have previously mentioned, are being similarly circularised. The Postmaster-General has refused to interfere with the distribution of these tickets, though they are posted wholesale in open envelopes. In view of this attempt to involve the police in the business I would suggest that a question on the subject should now be put to the Home Secretary.

A paragraph in the Times of Monday announced that a motor-car, which a certain company has presented to the East London Hospital for Children, is to be raffled for the sum of £200. It was added that tickets may be obtained from the secretary of the hospital or the secretary of the company giving the car. One is naturally reluctant to say a word that could in any way damage so deserving an institution as this hospital, but it is really necessary to point out the objections to this method of raising funds. The most serious is the violation of the law. Lotteries for religious and charitable purposes are, we know, tolerated in Ireland, but in this country the authorities have not hitherto permitted the law to be openly broken in this way, though, of course, raffles on a smaller scale are constantly held under less public conditions at bazaars. To allow the sale of tickets to be carried on in the manner which is being adopted in the present case would virtually mean the abrogation of the Lottery Act. It would be practically impossible to restrict the privilege to deserving charities, or even to charities at all, and gambles of this sort would soon become a source of scandal and mischief.

In TRUTH of January 9 an account was given of an action brought by a private in the Jersey Militia against his Commanding Officer, Lieutenant-Colonel Bagnall, and other military functionaries, in respect of his illegal imprisonment. The man had been required to pay 2s. 6d. for cleaning his rifle, which had been returned dirty at the end of the training, but instead of following the legal course and suing him in the civil court, the C.O. ordered him to attend at the Arsenal—the man being no longer under military discipline—fined him 5s. for refusing to do so, imprisoned him for twenty-four hours when he refused to pay the fine, and on his release imprisoned him for another ninety-six hours for refusing to obey another unlawful order. On this ground the militiaman recovered a verdict for £5 damages against the C.O., and £1 against the other defendants, with costs.

I understand that these damages and costs have now been refunded to the defendants by the War Office; in other words, the British taxpayer has had to pay them. As a taxpayer, I protest against this course. An officer who by illegal conduct and excess of authority renders himself amenable to a civil court ought to pay the penalty; and the Jersey Militia is a local force, for the upkeep of which the War Office has no financial responsibility. If the money was to be refunded at all, it should have been refunded by the Jersey authorities. If the States refused to vote the money, the defendants should have been left to pay it themselves. It seems to me that the War Office has as much exceeded its authority as did the Colonel, and that Parliament should signify the same in the usual manner.

Under a War Office order issued a year or two ago acting N.C.O.s going through the gunners' staff course at Shoeburyness are only to draw their acting pay with the consent of the General Commanding their District. The ostensible reason for this is that they only go through the course for their own advantage, but this is obviously an untenable view of the matter, if only for the reason that every N.C.O. who improves his qualifications does it for the public advantage as well as his own. Apart, however, from that, the advantage to the man can only arise from improved prospect of promotion, which seems in this case quite visionary, seeing that the man who was at the top of the course in 1905 has not yet obtained any appointment in consequence, and has no immediate prospect of it; while, on the other hand, there is the hard fact that the men going through this course lose the pay of their rank as well as their specialist pay. Under these circumstances the inducement to go through the course becomes extremely exiguous. It is true that a man may be allowed by his General to continue in receipt of his acting pay while at Shoeburyness, and apparently the majority of Generals—no doubt appreciating the considerations mentioned above—appear to have authorised the payment. But as this has not been done in all cases, it only creates an anomaly which aggravates the grievance. The whole arrangement seems to need revision.

Another grievance of the R.G.A. is reported from Hong Kong, and relates to inconsistencies in promoting men to the rank of sergeant. On a vacancy occurring not long ago in one company it was filled by promotion of a corporal from another company, on the ground that he had a first-class certificate of education. When the next vacancy occurred in the same company two men who had first-class certificates of education were passed over, this time on the ground that promotion was to run through all the companies in the command, and not to be limited to individual companies. Yet another vacancy occurred, and this last rule was set aside. The conclusion naturally is that promotion is purely a matter of caprice, and that the reasons for the selection of one man rather than another are invented to suit each case. On the facts as above stated I do not see how any other view is possible.

There is a club at Madras primarily for the benefit of privates and N.C.O.s of the Ordnance Department, though men of other departments and civilians are eligible for election as honorary members. The president of the club is the Ordnance Officer in charge of Madras Arsenal; the vice-president is elected by the members each quarter. At the last quarterly meeting a new vice-president was elected by a majority of twenty-one to five. The new man had served some time ago as vice-president with great advantage to the finances of the club, and his election was apparently due to a general feeling that there was again room for improvement in the management. However, the president took upon himself to over-rule the votes of the majority and re-appoint the late vice-president. It seems that there is a rule that any proposition put before a meeting of the club and not approved by the president shall be null and void; but this can hardly be intended to apply to the election of a vice-president, or it would mean that this officer is merely to be the president's nominee. But whether the rules justify his action or not, the president seems to show very little discretion in over-ruling the votes of three quarters of the club in a purely domestic matter of this kind.

A very strong feeling exists in certain regiments in South Africa against a recent order, which lays down that a man must be a first-class shot in order to be qualified for first-class pay. In the case of one regiment the whole of the men who are affected by this order had extended their service before it was issued, and therefore on the understanding that they were entitled to first-class pay notwithstanding that they might only be in the second class in musketry. If a man contends that this change in the conditions of his pay is a breach of faith with him, I do not see what answer any one in authority can make. It is obvious that if you are going to make pay dependent upon certain qualifications or attainments, you must lay down one fixed rule and stick to it permanently. It is impossible to vary the conditions from time to time without committing in many cases what is equivalent to a breach of contract. No doubt it is most desirable to improve musketry, but there are other qualifications for an efficient and useful soldier which ought to count for a great deal; and the correspondent who calls my attention to what has happened in South Africa, and who is not himself in any way affected by the order, asserts that among the men who have in this way had their pay reduced there are several of the best soldiers in the battalion.

I wonder whether we shall ever hear the end of the grievances arising out of the distribution of South African war medals. A gentleman who served in one of the colonial corps has recently obtained his medal, after, as he expresses it, "five years' persistent worrying"; and now that he has got it, it arrives without the usual pin. He sends a photograph of the medal and clasps, in proof of the statement. I can only recommend him to continue his worrying for another five years, and I should think that in the course of that time it might be possible to extract a pin from the War Office.

It is one of the minor grievances of the dockyard writers that their designation might be changed with advantage. Probably this is not a mere matter of sentiment, for it may reasonably be supposed that the labelling of them with a different name from all other men in the public service doing similar work helps the Admiralty to an excuse for making a corresponding distinction in their terms of service. This view will derive support from the peremptory refusal which Mr. Robertson gave the other day to Mr. Lamb's suggestion that the name should be changed. If you call a man a clerk you must treat him like other clerks doing similar work. If you call him a writer there is no standard by which to measure him, and you consequently may therefore treat him in any way you think appropriate to his nondescript status.

I believe I am right in saying that the work performed by a great many of the dockyard writers is of a more responsible nature than that of the majority of second division Civil Service clerks, though in pay and prospects there is no room for comparison between the position of the two. In the Naval Stores Department the men have to prepare all requisitions and estimates for stores required for the Navy, conduct all correspondence relating to them, and of late years actually place orders with contractors. Such orders run into many thousands of pounds annually, and until a few years ago this particular work was performed by highly paid officials in the Contracts Department of the Admiralty. Is it surprising that the dockyard writers are struggling to "better themselves"?

Not long ago I called attention to the deplorable failure of the Post Office to afford proper telephone service in the Willesden district, attention having been called to the matter by a firm who set up a branch establishment there, and were absolutely unable to obtain telephonic communication. Here is another complaint of precisely the same character, the complainants being a well-known firm of manufacturing opticians, doing a large business, not only in this country, but abroad:—

> We are manufacturers, who have recently moved our works to Neasden, near Willesden, while retaining show rooms in central London. We compete in all quarters of the world with energetic German and other foreign firms, who command all the help and patronage which their Governments can give them. When we moved to Neasden there was no telephonic communication, but we were informed that it would soon be established. Our new factory is only six miles from Charing Cross. We have been eight months in our new quarters, but we are still unable to speak by telephone to our central office, or to the shippers who despatch our wares to America, the Colonies, and the Far East.
> The Post Office authorities informed us that there was a difficulty about way-leaves. We have communicated with the local authorities and the principally concerned landowners, who will readily give all the necessary way-leaves in order that this important suburb may be linked in the usual way with the rest of civilisation. Still, the Post Office, though courteously acknowledging our inquiries, does not move, and while provincial firms and many of our Continental rivals can make bargains by telephone with London merchants, we, in suburban Middlesex, and the N.W. London postal district, are practically out of the commercial world.

It is scarcely necessary to emphasise the importance of this complaint. For well known commercial reasons it is becoming more and more the practice for manufacturing firms in London to move their works into the suburbs, and the Post Office has lamentably failed in its duty if it does not make arrangements for every extension of the telephone service which this process renders necessary. A telephone is in these days an indispensable adjunct to every business, and it is as essential that the Post Office should supply telephones when commercial establishments grow up on the outskirts of London, as it is that the local authorities should construct roads and sewers, or water companies lay down their mains. If the Post Office fails in this duty, business is hampered, and the natural and healthy expansion of London is restricted. Surely with a Liberal Minister at the head of the Post Office, it ought not to be necessary to point this out. If it is, however, I would suggest to my correspondents and their neighbours in the same district, a large number of whom are suffering in the same way, that they should point it out to the P.M.G. in Parliament through their local representatives.

Here is a sublime example of Orange bigotry at Belfast. The Works Committee of the Corporation were recently informed that the post of permit clerk was vacant, and they instructed the superintendent to exercise his discretion in filling up the vacancy, telling him that he should be guided by seniority coupled with merit. He did so. It turned out, however, that though the superintendent is himself a Protestant—that, indeed, goes without saying, for otherwise he would not be superintendent—he had actually so far disregarded the traditions of the Corporation as to give the clerkship to a Roman Catholic. The latter had been employed in a subordinate capacity for nine years, he bore an excellent character, and in the opinion of the superintendent he was the best qualified among the staff for promotion. But all this was, of course, immaterial in the eyes of the Orangemen. The Works Committee were exhorted and even intimidated not to let "a —— Papist" have the job, and at their next meeting they succumbed to this pressure, revoking the appointment of the Roman Catholic clerk, and putting a Protestant in his place. And it is from Belfast that we hear the most furious and indignant outcry against the alleged sectarian jobbery of Nationalist councils!

In view of the revelations during the prosecution of the West Ham Guardians I have been struck by a passage which appears in a recent agenda paper of the General Purposes Committee of the Bermondsey Borough Council. The passage is evidently a report from one of the borough officials. He mentions that a certain firm delivered a quantity of gold leaf supposed to contain 1,000 leaves, which on being counted was found only to contain 500. When the error was pointed out to them they apologised, and sent the other 500, but the gentleman who makes the report adds that the quality of the gold leaf is not up to his requirements, and that he is still in negotiation with the contractors.

The writer goes on to mention that the same firm delivered twenty cans of copal varnish, each of which was one quart short of its proper quantity, the total deficiency being 5 gallons. The cans being returned, a fresh consignment was substituted, in which each can proved to be half a pint short. On another occasion three dozen sponges were delivered and rejected as not up to sample, and on a fresh delivery being made nineteen only could be accepted, and this only because they were urgently required. Finally an alleged pound of oxalic acid was found on delivery to weigh half a pound. It would be interesting to know what notice the Borough Council takes of these little eccentricities on the part of its contractors.

THE TELEPHONE BELLE:

Cr the advantages of a musical voice.—Vide Daily Papers.

Do you pity the lot of your telephone Sis,
Whose days are eternally flurried
With "Hi!" "Are you there?" "Do connect me up, Miss!"
From customers testy and hurried?
Do you look on her life
As one harassing strife
By "Gerrards" and "Westminsters" worried?

If you do, you are wrong; for although it is true
At times she is cruelly harried,
Set off against that the unique opportu-
Nitees that she has to get married,
As the tones of her voice
With their music rejoice
The male men to whom they are carried.

For a musical voice (and my voice must be that),
Though out of sight a girl's face is,
Makes the hearts of susceptible youths pit-a-pat
With its dulcet acoustical graces;
So that amorous fire
They breathe me per wire,
And send telephonic embraces.

Then envy, don't pity, the Telephone Belle—
Her lot in life do not disparage—
Who wrings from the men, by her music's sweet spell,
The ring that's a token of marriage;
And prompt is to chime
In affirmative time
With the lover that offers a carriage.

The original BLUE BLACK INK was invented by Henry Stephens in 1831. It has been frequently imitated but never equalled, and is to-day by far the most fluid and reliable ink in the world.

The estimates of their assets by insolvent debtors frequently differ widely from the results shown on realisation; but the records of the bankruptcy courts do not often reveal a higher flight of imagination on the part of a debtor than is shown in the case of Major-General Barwell, whose Trustee has just issued his accounts. The Major-General estimated that his estate would realise £128,709 odd; the Trustee actually got out of it £916. The debtor imagined that he had a surplus of £24,959 from "securities in the hands of creditors fully secured." The actual surplus proved to be nil. He imagined that he had "book debts, good" to the value of £4,500, but the Trustee has been unable to recover a penny of them. Finally, the gallant officer saw in his imagination "interests in public companies" to the value of £99,250. The Trustee realised under this head a matter of £822.

The debtor seems to have been nearer the truth in his estimate of his liabilities, which he put at £348,146, for they actually came out at £328,705. After paying "costs on the usual scale" the Trustee had £489 wherewith to discharge this trifling indebtedness, and this sum has yielded to the creditors five-fourteenths of a penny in the pound. Major-General Barwell has cut a figure, of sorts, for many years past as a company promoter. I fear that many shareholders have as little cause to bless his name as have the creditors in his bankruptcy.

A correspondent sends me particulars of a case of cruelty to a horse heard by the Ipswich county magistrates last week, in which the employer was fined 10s. and costs, and the carter who was in charge of the horse at the time was fined 2s. 6d. and costs. "Surely," argues my correspondent, "if the master was proved guilty, the servant, though technically particeps criminis, might have been let off. We all know," he adds, "the conditions of country service, and no labourer would risk his place by refusing to obey his master's orders." There is a good deal of force in my correspondent's contention, but at the same time an appreciation of the carter's difficulties must not blind one to the fact that he is actually and not merely technically particeps criminis. Magistrates generally are ready to recognise the distinction between the respective responsibilities of master and servant in such cases in the fines inflicted, and I see no reason to quarrel with the Ipswich County Bench for their decision in this particular case.

A very wholesome lesson was given to butchers who attempt to trade in carrion by the Stockport magistrates last week. One William Henry Gardiner, who was described as having a number of shops in Stockport and as carrying on a large wholesale trade, was summoned for having in his possession unsound meat intended for sale. He admitted that the forequarters and carcass of a calf, which contained tuberculous deposits, were his property, and evidence was given to the effect that the meat had been stripped so as to remove traces of the disease. The magistrates sent him to prison for three months, with hard labour, without the option of a fine. If this method of dealing with such offenders were more widely adopted there would be a great deal less of this filthy traffic carried on than there is at present.

The 60 per cent. bloodsuckers appear to have a good friend in Judge Emden, of the Lambeth County Court. A correspondent sends me particulars of a recent case in which interest at this rate had been exacted upon a loan of £30, though the lender had the security of a bill of sale on furniture worth three or four times that amount. When the borrower had paid back £24 7s. 6d. he fell into arrears with his monthly instalment, and under a threat that he would be "sold up" for the balance of the principal and interest, he took proceedings in the County Court to have the transaction reopened and revised under Section 1 of the Moneylenders Act. In many cases, both in the High Court and the County Courts, almost precisely similar bill of sale transactions have been held to be harsh and unconscionable—60 per cent. being manifestly an outrageously excessive charge on a well-secured loan—and the borrower has been granted relief by the reduction of the interest. Judge Emden, however, not only declined to exercise his powers under the Act, but added to the financial difficulties of the unfortunate borrower by ordering him to pay the moneylender's costs in connection with the application.

Recently I referred to some cases in the Liverpool Police-court which incidentally threw a light on the rapacity of various semi-professional female moneylenders whose business is done among working-class women. I suggested that the harpies in question might perhaps be found to be liable to prosecution for non-registration under the Moneylenders Act. From a communication that I have received, however, it appears that they were actually registered, the prosecutions that the Liverpool police had previously instituted having opened their eyes to the requirements of the law in this respect. My informant proceeds:—

> Probably the framers of the Act hardly contemplated a class of moneylenders like this, but the present system of registering anybody who will pay the fee amounts to granting licence to a most iniquitous trade, one which tempts women to drink, to bet, and to do other things which lead to neglect of home duties, and so increase the sum of misery which unfortunately is the lot of so many of the children of the poor.
> The protection given by the Act is only effective when the lender resorts to the County Court; but that is not the means of putting on the screw used by the slum moneylender, who, as the poor borrowers say, "thumps it out of them."

It is a lamentable state of things. Unfortunately, however, it is impossible to see how any remedy could be found for it in an alteration of the law with regard to moneylending. So far as registration is concerned it is obvious that it would be impracticable to attempt to exclude any particular class of lenders from the register. Besides, even if the difficulty of discriminating between them could be satisfactorily overcome there would still be the objection that such a system would lead people to think that those admitted to the register were persons whose methods of business had received the approval of the authorities.

The police deserve credit for their success in bringing to book at Bow-street last week a printer named Julius Schuneman, who was convicted of an offence, under the Lottery Act, in connection with the publication of circulars relating to a Saxon State lottery. It appeared that a firm of so-called "bankers" at Bremen employed the defendant to print 48,000 circulars, which were distributed in this country in December last, the firm's object being to save the cost of postage from abroad. As usual in these cases, the defendant pleaded that he did not know that he was committing an offence. Ignorance is no excuse for a breach of the law, and, moreover, in view of the secrecy with which orders of this kind are executed, I should doubt very much whether the printers, who carefully refrain from putting their imprints on the circulars, are quite so innocent in the matter as magistrates are ready to believe.

Mr. Fenwick fined the defendant £25 and costs. It is obviously absurd to expect that the offence will be suppressed so long as it is dealt with so leniently. The difference between the cost of foreign and inland postage on a big batch of circulars—a saving of three halfpence on each—is so substantial that the German lottery agents can well afford to pay such penalties as are imposed on their accomplices over here; and, seeing how constantly this offence is being committed, and how difficult it is to trace the offenders, the time has arrived when those who are caught ought to be punished far more severely. The magistrates have power to send the culprits to gaol without the option of a fine, and it would have a salutary effect if this were done.

A correspondent at Winnipeg is anxious that I should "take up the case" of an English emigrant named Fred C. Hawkins, who has been condemned to twenty years "in Stony Mountain penitentiary" for burglary. It was certainly a heavy sentence—in fact, a local paper says that it is the heaviest ever inflicted in the Winnipeg Municipal Court. Hawkins, however, pleaded guilty to no fewer than ten burglaries, and, according to his own account, "the sensation of robbing people in a daring manner worked upon him in such a way that he could not stop it." All sorts and conditions of men are advised to emigrate to Canada; but this sentence shows that burglars at least would do well to keep away from that country.

Nowhere in the United Kingdom are offences of violence treated so systematically with misplaced lenity as in the Glasgow police-courts, and rarely a week passes without the necessity arising for placing one or other of the presiding Bailies in my Legal Pillory. This week the case reported from the Southern Police-court supplies an example remarkable even in Glasgow records. To let off with a paltry fine ruffians who waylay peaceful citizens in the streets, throw pepper in their eyes, knock them down, and kick and maim their victims, betrays a lamentable condition of mind on the part of the magistrate before whom they were brought, and while Glasgow magistrates take such extraordinary views of what constitutes adequate punishment for crimes of violence the reputation which Glasgow is rapidly gaining as the most hooligan-ridden city in the kingdom, is likely to go on increasing.

I rejoice to see that the police have laid hold of the individual who has so long been trading at Winchester-avenue, Kilburn, under the name of Dorey Lester and Co. As to the particular charges that are now preferred against him I, of course, express no opinion. But so many have been preferred against him during the last few years in the columns of TRUTH, that I shall be greatly interested to see whether my opinion about him is or is not justified by the result.

Reference has already been made in TRUTH to the annoyance that has been caused in many parts of London by the delivery from house to house "on appro." of a directory issued by a firm called the Granville Press, of 31, Eagle-street. I have just had another letter on the subject from a gentleman who, like everybody else, objects to having goods dumped in his house in this way, and to his servants having the trouble of answering the door, and looking for the book and returning it when the publishers choose to send for it. He has therefore adopted a policy of retaliation by way of protecting himself against such dumping—evidently being, though he does not mention it, a student of the fiscal controversy. He has hidden the book, and concealed from his servants all knowledgs of its whereabouts, and he is now consoling himself with the fruitless efforts of the publishers to recover the book. He suggests that if householders generally would take similar measures, the annoyance would cease, and no doubt this is so. Most people object to this practice, but few have the courage or the sense to convey their objections in a practical manner. If they had, firms who can only unload their goods by this obnoxious method would speedily have to shut up shop.

An old friend re-appears in the following letter, written a few weeks ago from 48, Castle-road, Portsmouth:—

MY LORD,—I humbly apologise for addressing your Lordship.

I am a miniature painter in deep financial difficulties and struggling in vain with adversity, mainly owing to failing sight.

With a view of improving a little my position, I have drawn with pen and ink the enclosed portrait, which I humbly beg your Lordship to deign accept, if convenient, for one guinea.

Appealing to your goodwill and forgiveness for this intrusion, I have the honour to be,

Your Lordship's humble servant,

GEORGE MARTIN.

George Martin is really a Frenchman named Cottrel or Cotrel. He was referred to in TRUTH so far back as January, 1897, when he was offering his work under the names of Marie Jansen, a French governess, and Olga Jansen, a Swedish governess; and I understand that he has been writing letters more or less like the above from time to time during the intervening period. He evidently gets his living in this way, and as he appears to do the work which he disposes of, I suppose that he must not be condemned too severely. But it is as well that those who receive his communications should understand that this has been his regular mode of livelihood for the last ten years, and that he has no claim to charity.

It was interesting to observe the outburst of some of the Tory papers last week on the subject of the better regulation of the milk supply of London. The Pall Mall Gazette affirmed that the deaths of innumerable children from inadequate nourishment are directly due to the adulteration of the milk which is given them. The Daily Telegraph declared that it was absolutely necessary that more effective steps should be taken to prevent the adulteration or contamination of the supply, and the Daily Mail urged that there should be an unceasing agitation until the authorities are aroused to the importance of the matter. With all this I heartily agree. What makes the appearance of these articles peculiarly interesting, however, is the fact that the General Powers Bill of the London County Council, now before the House of Commons, originally contained the very provisions for the better regulation of the milk supply which are being so forcibly demanded. The Bill was drafted when the Council was Progressive; and one of the first things which the present Moderate majority did was to strike out the clauses in question—clauses which their supporters in the press tell us are absolutely necessary for the protection of the life and health of the community!

In common with most other people, I regret that a good many honest and skilful operatives should find themselves thrown out of work at Woolwich because we are not inclined to waste more money than is necessary in manufacturing warlike instruments of destruction. But I cannot agree with those who hold that we ought either to continue to manufacture such goods without having any use for them, or to find something else for the employees to make at Woolwich. I can, however, quite understand that these worthy fellows should uphold the doctrine themselves, and that it should be adopted by those Socialists who hold that it is the duty of the State to find work at a decent wage for every one in want of it. These men were engaged during the warlike craze that raged a few years ago, and it is possible that—given a state of war—a larger supply of lethal contrivances was then needed to slay the enemy. But that is no reason why we should continue to employ the men now. It might as well be contended that if we were in danger of an immediate invasion, and masons and others were employed to build works at some fortress, the men ought to be kept on at work after the fortifications had been completed, and all risk of the fortress being besieged had disappeared.

It is asserted by the friends of the men that some method ought to be found to utilise their skill in times of peace in peaceable work, and it is insisted that they should be employed at Woolwich because that town will suffer in its prosperity if all the houses that have been built there are not let. I am sorry for Woolwich house-owners, but I see no particular reason why the State should come to their aid. If the men themselves were to be employed in some new industry, it is evident that work would be taken from others, for we cannot control the quantity of any article sold, and consequently their gain would be the loss of other men equally honest and equally desirous of a job, whilst the employers of the latter would find a considerable portion of their capital outlay unremunerative, whilst the owners of houses where these private works are situated would be unable to let them. The question raises the issue between the State being the sole employer of labour, or the State leaving industries to private enterprise, and this ought not to be decided upon what is a mere local issue.

Where I think Mr. Crooks has made a point was in complaining that while the workers were discharged, yet the additional staff of supervisors was kept on at a war standard. The reductions ought to be carried out at a corresponding rate in all grades. Liberals are perpetually clamouring for economy, yet some of them adduce the reason for not discharging men at Woolwich who are in excess of requirements that we may possibly need them in case of some future war. It might equally be said that our Army ought to be on a war footing in peace times—a doctrine that is held by some crazy Jingoes, but can only be scouted by every Liberal.

King Leopold secured the sovereignty of the Congo State, not owing to any exertions of his own, or any sort of claim of a dynastic or personal character, but because the Powers thought fit to select him for the position. But he obtained it under certain conditions, which, if carried out by him, would, it was hoped, put an end to all international rivalries there, and secure to its natives good government and good treatment. Even assuming that there is some exaggeration in the accounts of the condition of the natives under the new rule—which is, to say the least, doubtful—there remains treatment which is a disgrace to humanity. The King seems to have regarded his kingdom as a sort of preserve within which everything should be subordinated to his personal greed. Unless he is greatly belied, he has been the promoter of numerous companies possessed of exclusive trading concessions over wide areas, and the most inhuman cruelties have been the rule towards the wretched inhabitants, practised by Government officials and the forces at their disposal in the interest of the Royal companies.

The Belgians are no more responsible for these than was the Parliament of Great Britain for the government of Hanover when the British Sovereign was the ruler of that country. Occasionally, endeavours have been made by the ruler of the Congo to hand it over to the Belgian nation. But for various reasons they have been declined. I can well understand this. King Leopold holds a vast number of shares in the companies that he promoted. One of the conditions of the transfer of rule would be that these companies should continue to exist, or, if either ended or deprived of their existing privileges, a heavy indemnity should be paid to them. Moreover, it is very doubtful whether under a proper system of government the acquisition of the Congo State would not prove a losing bargain to the Belgian taxpayer, however profitable it might be to some individuals.

The Belgians ought, therefore, clearly to perceive that the protests against the cruelties of King Leopold's myrmidons in Africa, which have been so strongly worded both in Parliament and in the press, are no evidence of any ill-feeling on our part towards them. If the Belgian State takes over the Congo State, with the full right to abrogate all concessions granted to King Leopold and his friends by King Leopold, I see no reason why it should not be well governed by Belgium, under full Parliamentary control and constitutional publicity. But we and other Powers cannot divest ourselves of the responsibility that we incurred in granting the Congo State to King Leopold, because he sells or gives rights thus acquired to a third party. The paramount right of the Powers to insist upon good government and proper treatment of the natives will remain, and this fact the Belgian nation must remember in considering the question of the transfer of the country from the King of the Belgians to the Belgian nation.

The general opinion amongst those Italians who, although they have rallied to the Kingdom of Italy, are Catholics, is that the selection of the present Pope has not proved a happy one. His predecessor, Leo XIII., was a man of considerable capacity, and understood fairly well the interests of the Church in the world. He was, indeed, a statesman, although, perhaps, not a first-rate one. In his long Pontificate he created nearly 200 Cardinals. In the early days of his Pontificate he had selected a considerable number of men of light and leading whose presence in the conclave was useful to the Church in its relations to the various centres over which it claimed a power spiritual. At the time of his death these men had almost all died out, and had been replaced by ex-nuncios, who claimed the Cardinalate as the reward of their services, and archbishops or bishops who were in almost all cases Italians, and ignorant of almost everything outside Italy.

On the death of Leo XIII. the only man who was —to translate an Italian word—"papable," probably, was Cardinal Rampolla. This the Cardinals themselves had the sense to perceive, and he would have been elected Pope had it not been for the Austrian veto. On Austria exercising it, they chose the then patriarch of Venice, a simple priest, whose elevation created no jealousies, who had not himself dreamed of his elevation to the Holy See, and of whom, if little was known, that little seemed to be to his advantage. It is entirely to his credit as a Priest that he understood nothing of the Papacy in its temporal aspect; indeed, he knew little of anything outside Italy. He was no statesman, and would have smiled had any one suggested that he was.

As Patriarch he had been popular at Venice, and he had lived on good terms with the rulers of the Kingdom of Italy. It was expected that he would break with the tradition of making the Cardinalate a mere step in the papal hierarchy—to be given to respectable nonentities rather than to the leading intellectual lights of the Church, or to men who were good on the Council from their capacity and knowledge of its needs and requirements. Since his elevation he has created thirteen Cardinals. But he has followed the old lines, except in one or two cases, in which his selection has been due to personal friendship. The only two who were men of any note are Merry del Val, whose selection as Secretary of State was not—all things considered—a particularly wise one, and Maffi, an able man, who is Archbishop of Pisa.

Pius X. has the very best intentions; but he has fallen into the illusion that he is able himself to direct the affairs of the Church. The result is what it always has been when a weak, well-meaning man undertakes a task for which he is entirely unfitted. He has become a mere instrument in the hands of a party; and in his case, unfortunately, that party is the most retrograde in the Church, and its leaders are, if more cunning and more ambitious than he, as little fitted for rule as he is himself. This at least is the opinion of unprejudiced and unbiassed Italian Catholics, and Italians are pretty accurate judges of character.

It has always surprised me that the leading men of the Roman Church do not seem to realise that the Chief Council of the Pope should not be almost exclusively comprised of Italians, and the selection of each new Pope left entirely in their hands, if the Church claims to be universal. When the Pope was a Sovereign reigning in Italy, there was some excuse for it. But now that this has ceased, and probably neither Pope nor Cardinals in their hearts believe that this temporal rule will ever be re-established, it seems hardly consistent with the interests of the Church that its head should always be an Italian, and also the vast majority of its Cardinals. This, however, concerns the Church more than it does me.

Were I not merely an Irish Home Ruler, but an Irishman, I am inclined to think that I should have voted for Mr. Birrell's Bill on its second reading, and at the same time have explained that I should only vote for its third reading if it were considerably altered in Committee. The first vote would simply recognise that administrative work in Ireland will be better done by an elected Council than by the Castle. The second vote—if cast against the Bill—would mean that the Council was so shorn of powers, and so dependent upon the English nominee who sits in state at the Council, that the Bill was a mere sham transfer of powers.

A scheme creating a Council elected by the votes of all Ireland, and granting some sort of legislative and executive powers, provided that it was of a workable character, and that the powers granted were real, would be a first step towards full Home Rule, for it would enable Irishmen to take some part in the government of the country, and permit them to show that they are as fitted for self-government as the English or Scotch. This would hardly, however, be the result unless the scheme were well thought out, and the Council not an assembly of marionnettes on wires which might be pulled at any moment by the Lord Lieutenant. Members of the Council should not be nominated by that nominee of the English Government, nor should he be able to veto its action. With a Liberal Cabinet in office such a restriction would be galling; with the Conservatives in office, bitterly opposed to the existence of the Council, and bent on rendering it an object-lesson against Home Rule, it would be harmful to Ireland and England.

Mr. Birrell is certainly not fortunate in his Bills. His Education Bill was satisfactory neither to the Conservatives nor to the Radicals, and neither to Churchmen nor Chapelmen, still less to the many who are against State teaching of any form of dogmatic theology. It was accepted by the majority in the Commons and in the country as a compromise. But compromises, although sometimes necessary, never arouse enthusiasm. That a few hundred peers and bishops should have had the effrontery to throw it out, was deemed a monstrous exercise of an indefensible right. But the indignation at that performance would have been far greater had the Bill itself been a better one. In seeking to please all, Mr. Birrell pleased no one, as is usual. His Irish Bill will fall dead, unless he promises to so amend it in Committee that it will find favour with the Irish and with the English Radicals—not, of course, as a final settlement of the Irish difficulty, nor even as a half-way house on the road to that goal, but as a first step in that direction. If he does this another Irish Convention would be pretty sure to reverse the decision arrived at last week. As the Government is taking another week before announcing its decision in regard to the Bill, it may be hoped that there is a prospect of its yet being made acceptable to the Irish, though my opinion of the Cabinet collectively does not lead me to regard that prospect hopefully.

How comes it that a Cabinet with a sound and honest Radical at its head, and a Radical Parliamentary majority behind it, submits measures to Parliament of so half-hearted a character? It is because some of its members are not Radicals, and insist on every Government Bill being spoilt to suit their own views. Some of them are able administrators and good debaters. There are particular issues in regard to which they are at one with the Radicals. There are others, however, on which they incline rather to Unionist than to Radical opinions. They are generals without an army, for I do not suppose that their following in the House of Commons at most exceeds thirty members.

If these gentlemen were to resign, the loss would perhaps be felt in debate and in administration, but the fortunes of the Government would not be endangered, for it still would have an overwhelming majority in Parliament and in the country. Whatever, therefore, the loss might be to the party, it would be amply compensated by having the Executive and the House of Commons at one in heart and spirit, and by the Government being able to bring in Bills to give effect to their views and aspirations without let or hindrance. If these gentlemen joined the Opposition, they would probably prove very doubtful allies; if they occupied a position of independence of all party ties, their fate would be that of their former leader, Lord Rosebery. I am convinced that we shall sooner or later have to shed them, and that the longer that this is delayed the greater will be the mischief. This probably is the view of nine-tenths of the Radicals, although they may not openly avow it.

We are shortly to learn the intentions of the Government in regard to the House of Lords. I trust that there will be no half-hearted action in this case, and that not one iota of what is necessary in order to put an end to the power of that House to defy the country and its representatives will be left untouched because a few Whigs may wish it. The veto of the Lords must be limited to one Session, and any Bill that has passed the Commons in two successive Sessions must become law without their having a right to interfere. This is the irreducible minimum of reform to which Radicals can consent, although many would go considerably further. If after the Lords have had their claws cut they propose any scheme to alter the composition of the Upper House, we will give it our best consideration. But on the veto there must be no shilly-shally, nor must we concern ourselves with reforms in the constitution of an existing branch of the Legislature before we know what are in future to be its powers.

I have been interested in a letter from one of my readers on the House of Lords question. He voted Liberal at the last election, "owing to the introduction of Chinese labour into South Africa;" but he did not approve of last year's Education Bill, and he is in favour of colonial preference. He thinks, therefore, that he only gave the Government a mandate to deal with the Chinese, and that the House of Lords should come to the rescue whenever it considers that a mandate has been exceeded, and that when it throws out a Bill there should at once be a general election. Personally, I should think it would be better to repeal the Septennial Act and have annual parliaments. The above suggestion seems merely to mean a referendum dependent on the will of the House of Lords, which is unthinkable.

The truth is that the "mandate" doctrine is a new constitutional notion developed within the last few years—chiefly, I should say, by journalists. A "mandate" can only be given decisively on one issue; but a Parliament is elected for seven years, and those who vote for the party which gets a majority must take the chance of what it will do, except so far as it may be pledged by its election addresses. That is the theory of the Constitution, and a necessary result of parliamentary government. Roughly speaking it works all right. The complainant in the above case must have known perfectly well that the first business of a Liberal Government would be to deal with the grievances created by the Education Act of 1902, and that they were pledged to resist colonial preference and tariff reform in every shape. I cannot see therefore that he has any grievance, nor if he had, how it is to be redressed. But, of course, there are thousands more like him who vote at every election on one ground without regard to others; and I suppose that is one reason why as a Government goes on more and more people are alienated from it. It is consequently turned out at the next election, unless, like Mr. Chamberlain in 1900, it can spring some novel issue which will again rally the masses to its standard.

THE HUMANITARIAN AND THE PLOVER'S EGGS.

Tom Tuck, while out once walking, found
Four Plover's Eggs upon the Ground,
In a slight Cavity depressed,
Which constitutes the Lapwing's Nest.
Now Tom, he was the Class of Man
That's called humanitarian—
Whose Principles, in Word at least,
Forbad to harm or Bird or Beast,
And all Unkindness to eschew
Towards Aught that ran, or swam, or flew.
Yet he, an Epicure, adored
The Pleasures of the festal Board,
And Naught his Palate's Sense—i' Fegs—
Tickled so much as Plover's Eggs.
Hence raged in him a dubious Fight
'Twixt Principle and Appetite,
As stood he, rooted to the Spot,
Debating an he should or not.
The Fight went on, until appeared
A sudden Light. Tom's Visage cleared.
"Tut! Birds can't count. No Odds 'twill make
If just one Egg, unseen, I take.
The Hen won't know, so can't be pained;
While I a nice Bonne Bouche have gained."
Quick stooped he down, one Egg he took,
Then turned as if to sling his Hook,
But, halting still, his Thoughts addressed
Once more to that terranean Nest.
"Since Birds can't count—now I've begun,
As well," he cried, "take two as one."
He stooped, a second Egg he took,
And turned again to sling his Hook.
But no! His Wish still kept his Legs
Close to those twain remaining Eggs.
"Dash it! If Birds can't count," said he,
"She'll never know if I take three."
So down he stooped, a third Egg took,
And turned, once more, to sling his Hook.
But no! Still lingered fond his Eyes
Upon that one remaining Prize.
"And if it's hatched—poor Thing," said he,
"Just think how lonely it will be.
Leave it thus lorn? Kind Heaven forbid!
I'll take it too."
And so he did.

JOURNALISM AND POLITICS.

THE protest of the Under-Secretary of the Colonies against newspapers of the Daily Mail type both directly and wilfully lying or distorting truth in matters affecting our relations with foreign States and our own Colonies was not a whit too strong. The press, with its boasted freedom, has now become—so far as regards London dailies—a close borough, belonging to a few individuals who use it for their own profit and glorification, with absolute disregard to the well-being of the community. No capital in Europe has so few daily papers as London in proportion to its population. This is due to the amount of capital that has to be invested in a daily paper with a view to a financial success that is always problematical. I am not blind to the merits of these journals. A good deal connected with them is well done, and so far the public gets the advantage. Moreover, there is no blackmailing in the English press, nor do political parties make any direct payment in return for support. With some rare exceptions, however, the London newspapers are financial undertakings carried on with the sole object of making money for their proprietors, regardless of the public weal. These owners are men of no political importance, and have no journalistic aptitude in its literary aspect. Their views upon men and things are not more likely to be correct than those of other tradesmen. Generally speaking, no doubt they understand their business thoroughly on its financial side. The aim is, of course, to secure a large circulation, a circulation being necessary in order to obtain advertisements, from which outlay is in the main met and profit secured. In order to obtain a wide circulation it is not necessary to obtain correct news of what is transpiring in the world; what is necessary is that the news shall be sensational and attract attention. False information, in some cases actually manufactured by the newspaper itself, is resorted to. This in home matters is bad enough, but when adopted in regard to matters which concern foreign countries and our Colonies is a positive danger to the country, for it inevitably breeds international friction and ill-will. Nor is the evil effect greatly mitigated by the correction of mis-statements, for, as that astute female politician, Catherine de Médicis, said, "It is sufficient for an untruth to be believed for twenty-four hours for it often to prove useful." This usefulness is all the more baneful when lying has become a habit, and when no sooner is one falsehood contradicted than another is launched. That the system is deemed sound from the business point of view by the astute gentlemen who practise it is in itself evidence that it really is so.

Outside public affairs, every man who publishes a statement harmful to another, which is not true in substance and in fact, and the publication of which cannot be shown to be to the public benefit, whether this may be due to deliberate untruth or to culpable negligence, is liable to heavy penalties. I think that a law might be passed which would lay the same responsibility on the publication of falsehoods for political purposes, when they are contrary to public interest.

I would even go further, as is the case in regard to private libels, for the injured party may, if he so pleases, prosecute the offender criminally. Were the proprietor of a newspaper to know that he might be sent to hard labour for six months if any false statement appeared in his newspaper, the publication of which was harmful to the country, this would have a far more deterring effect than a mere fine. It may be said that a newspaper which has recourse to these methods to attract attention to itself will lose in circulation, and consequently in advertisements. But, as I have said, it is unfortunately true that the reverse is the case, and the greatest offender is possibly the newspaper that boasts—and in this case with truth—that it has the largest circulation.

In regard to mere party politics, I do not quite agree with Mr. Churchill in his denunciations of the Unionist press because it distorts and misrepresents all that is done by its opponents. This is a charge that one party always makes against the other, and the sin is to a greater or lesser degree true in regard to all. We are so accustomed to the ex parte mode of representing facts that it is productive of small mischief. It is like the speeches of the lawyers appearing respectively for plaintiff and defendant in a court of law. There a judge sums up the rival speeches, and seeks to make clear to the jury what are the real facts. In the absence of any official to separate the corn from the chaff of party advocacy in newspapers, this has to be done by the public, and their verdict is the outcome of what is called public opinion. Not only do they deliver the verdict, but they pass sentence. When international relations are not affected, I would allow every one to say what he pleases concerning the merits or demerits of a party, and to distort facts as he pleases. To carry such tactics to excess is more harmful to the party for which it is done than to their opponents or the public.

I should like to see more daily newspapers, and to see those that exist have a more numerous proprietary. But we have to take the world as it is, and make the best of it. So long as a newspaper is a commercial undertaking, commercial considerations will be the mainspring, and so long as it is run by one or two individuals these individuals will not sacrifice private gain to public spirit. In this they are like most human beings, consequently I do not greatly blame them, for in the present age very little is done on millennium principles. Where I particularly agree with Mr. Churchill is in his condemnation of the action of the late Government in rewarding a journalistic supporter who had backed them through thick and thin, by creating him a perpetual legislator, with the power to hand over his legislative rights to a descendant when he disappears from the earth. I go, indeed, further. I would never grant any title to the proprietor of a newspaper. It is contrary to all journalistic independence. In the matter of such rewards I would leave him to make money, and to imagine himself, if he pleases, the member of a priesthood, without particularly inquiring why he indulges in this illusion. I am against all titles, but if I were in favour of them, and if I believed that they should be granted to journalists, I would award them to some distinguished writer on the press, rather than to the business gentleman, who is to the real journalist what the capitalist is to the inventor.

THE EDALJI SCANDAL.

I spoke last week of the Home Secretary's decision in the Edalji case as "a compromise with justice." The articles by Sir A. Conan Doyle, which have since appeared in the Daily Telegraph, should be sufficient to convince every reader that the decision amounts to a gross injustice. Sir Arthur Wilson's Committee, while finding that the circumstantial evidence produced at the trial was insufficient to justify a conviction, held that there was evidence to prove that the prisoner wrote the anonymous letters which led to his arrest, and that the writing of these letters might have been the work of an innocent man perpetrating a practical joke in a spirit of "impish mischief." Mr. Herbert Gladstone, adopting this last view, made it the ground of refusing compensation to Mr. Edalji for three years' wrongful imprisonment, while granting him a free pardon, thereby leaving him under the stigma of having brought his trouble on himself by what would be grossly unbecoming conduct on the part of a professional gentleman, and gravely prejudicing his prospect of obtaining reinstatement in his profession and recovering his former position in life. What Sir Conan Doyle has now done is to show the weakness of the evidence that Mr. Edalji ever wrote the letters and the strong probability that they were written by somebody else.

If any one desires to appreciate the full weight of the argument upon these letters, I would refer him to Sir Conan Doyle's articles, in which typical specimens of all the handwritings are given in facsimile. But I should like to make it clear to those who have not the Daily Telegraph at hand exactly what Sir Conan Doyle's examination of the documents tends to prove. In the first place—as pointed out in Truth in the earliest stage of the discussion of the case—the theory that Mr. Edalji wrote the letters used at his trial in 1903 is beset with the strongest inherent improbability. The letters are certainly not in his ordinary handwriting—even Mr. Gurrin did not suggest that. They are in language and general style the compositions of an uneducated man. They betray familiarity with persons and incidents outside Mr. Edalji's knowledge—and the more so now that he is admittedly innocent of the cattle-maiming outrages. What motive he could ever have had for writing them it was difficult to see, remembering that he was a lawyer and that they would tend to convict him of atrocious crimes; and the motive of "impish mischief," now put forward by the Committee, is as incredible as any that has been suggested previously. All that is now known of Mr. Edalji's character, as uniformly quiet, well-behaved, and of studious habits, from boyhood upwards, is as inconsistent with his engaging in a series of vulgar hoaxes in the pretended character of an illiterate and criminal hooligan, as it is with the theory that he amused himself at night in the intervals of his professional work by roaming about the country maiming the cattle and horses of his father's parishioners. There is another point which the Committee can scarcely have had in their minds when they advanced the "impish mischief" theory. One of the letters attributed by Mr. Gurrin to Edalji was a postcard addressed to himself at his own office in Birmingham, conveying the foulest imputation, not merely upon him, but upon a lady in the neighbourhood. Even granting that a spirit of impish mischief might move him to play practical jokes for the purpose of fooling the police in their hunt after the cattle-maimer, is it conceivable that a professional man would gratuitously address a libel of this character to himself at his own office, with the practical certainty that it would be read by other people in transit? And this postcard, be it remembered, was posted at Wolverhampton on a day when Mr. Edalji was able to prove conclusively that he was not in that town, having started very early in the morning on an excursion to Aberystwith, and returned late at night! In the face of these considerations it has always seemed to me that no weight whatever attaches to Mr. Gurrin's detection of two or three points of resemblance between the handwriting of the anonymous letters and the ordinary handwriting of Mr. Edalji, seeing that such resemblances might have been intentionally introduced, and that the writer was confessedly seeking to incriminate Mr. Edalji.

But this is only a portion of the case. The fact was never even mentioned at the trial, but is now common knowledge, that long prior to the Great Wyrley outrages of 1903, the Edalji family had been for a period of three or four years exposed to intolerable annoyance by the writing of anonymous letters to themselves and other people, the insertion of forged advertisements in newspapers, and practical jokes and hoaxes of a dozen kinds. The author of the anonymous letters of this period appeared to be inspired by demoniacal hatred of George Edalji, and his letters, often of portentous length, were full of appalling blasphemy and disgusting obscenity, suggesting at every point the ravings of a lunatic. The possibility of a connection between this phenomenon and the outbreak of anonymous writing at George Edalji's expense in 1903 suggests itself at once to anybody desirous of getting at the truth of the whole business, but from first to last, by the police who got up the prosecution, by the court at the trial, by the Home Office staff who have had the case before them off and on for three and a half years, no attempt has been made to follow up this line of investigation, and the clues arising out of it. Here it is that Sir Conan Doyle has come in. Laying hold of the clue furnished by the intrusion of a key stolen from Walsall Grammar School into one of the practical jokes played at Wyrley Vicarage in 1894—not impossibly a veritable key to the whole Edalji mystery—and following up this clue by careful personal investigations on the spot, he has unearthed a boy then in the school, an unruly boy of criminal tendency, who actually at that date gave evidence of what Captain Anson has called "propensity for anonymous letter-writing," and actually practised his hand on the headmaster of the school. Further clues connect an elder brother of this boy with anonymous letter-writing in the Edalji correspondence of the same period. A specimen of this handwriting reproduced in the Daily Telegraph of Friday last seems to me to present at least one remarkable point of resemblance to the writing of one of the letters used at the trial. Finally come the letters written to Mr. Edalji from Birmingham last January in the name of "Martin Molton," and an anonymous letter with which Sir Conan Doyle himself was favoured only a few weeks ago, and here we have the most striking resemblances to the handwriting of the Walsall Grammar School boy of 1894, and to certain of the letters attributed to Mr. Edalji at his trial in 1903.

Such is a brief indication of the nature of the case which Sir Conan Doyle has made out on the handwriting. He has discovered much more than this, including evidence bearing more directly on the cattle-maiming outrages. The time for going into this has not yet come, though it should be noted that a theory of the whole case, pointing directly to certain parties, was submitted by Sir Conan Doyle to the Home Office, and was presumably among the documents referred for consideration to Sir Arthur Wilson's Committee. But without going outside the mere question of the anonymous letter-writing, it is beyond all controversy that, thanks to Sir Conan Doyle, there is now definite evidence that the letters of 1903 were written by another party and not by Mr. Edalji; and this evidence, instead of being, like the evidence given by Mr. Gurrin, totally at variance with extraneous facts and inherent probability, is entirely consistent with all that can be proved about the character, habits, and history of the alleged writer or writers.

In view of this revelation the result of the last Home Office inquiry assumes the dimensions of a serious public scandal. It is quite certain that no critical examination of the handwriting in comparison with others bearing on the question of authorship ever took place before Sir Arthur Wilson's Committee; it is doubtful whether the committee ever had the materials for such an examination before them. Their procedure must be judged from their report, which merely says that they have examined the documents in evidence at the trial, that they see the points of resemblance which Mr. Gurrin indicated, that they "think" the jury "must be taken to have held that Edalji was the writer of those letters," and "they are not prepared to dissent from the finding at which they think the jury arrived." What is the value of these opinions if the Committee had not before them the materials on which alone the correctness of the finding of the jury can be disputed? And what is the value of an official inquiry from which the most essential evidence in the case is excluded? Yet it is on the result of such an inquiry that Mr. Gladstone finds Mr. Edalji to have brought his troubles on himself, and refuses him the compensation and the full exoneration to which justice entitles him.

There are other points in the finding of the Committee open to unfavourable remark. It is worthy of note how they confine themselves to "thinking" that the jury held Edalji to be the writer of the letters. The jury, of course, never gave any finding to that effect, and it was not the issue submitted to them. There was a further count against the prisoner, besides stabbing the pony, of writing a threatening letter to a policeman. This charge was founded upon one of the anonymous letters, and if pressed would have involved an express finding as to the authorship. But after the prisoner had been convicted on the first charge, this one was dropped. It has always been extremely difficult to find out exactly what took place at the trial; but I gather from Mr. Edalji himself that what happened in regard to the anonymous letters was this: They were referred to by counsel for the prosecution in opening as evidence that the prisoner was concerned in a cattle-maiming conspiracy. In order that they might be put in as such evidence, Mr. Gurrin was called to prove that the prisoner wrote them. He gave his evidence on the handwriting—such as it was—and then the letters were put in. They therefore went to the jury as forming, by virtue of their contents, part of the evidence against the prisoner on the charge of stabbing the pony. The jury may very possibly have accepted Mr. Gurrin's evidence, in the absence of any contradiction; but the question of authorship, so far as it was decided at all, was decided by the Court when it admitted the letters. Let no one think that this is a mere lawyer's point. It affords direct evidence of the mental attitude of the Committee towards the case. They could have ascertained as easily as I can how the letters came before the jury, and if they had done so they would not have been able to shelter themselves behind an imaginary finding of the jury, and in this way to assume that Edalji wrote the letters, and give Mr. Gladstone the pretext for the course he took. There was an excellent letter from Judge Parry in the Manchester Guardian of May 21, in which, though not having had the advantage of seeing Sir Conan Doyle's evidence, he strongly condemns the conclusions of the Committee about the anonymous letters. His Honour does not believe that the Committee themselves evolved the theory of the letters having been written by Mr. Edalji as "a piece of impish mischief." He asks how it came to be suggested, and wonders whether it originated with a policeman. In view of what we know of the official police theory of Mr. Edalji's character, he has cause for wondering. I wonder, too.

Seeing the unsatisfactory nature of the result arrived at, not only in the above but in other respects, it is impossible to close one's eyes to certain other facts. The conduct of the police in getting up the case against Mr. Edalji has been the subject of most unfavourable remark, and even Sir Arthur Wilson's Committee were forced to criticise it. For the action of the police, the Chief Constable of Staffordshire, Captain the Hon. G. A. Anson, is officially responsible, and language which he has used in regard to Mr. Edalji, long prior to the trial, and again subsequently to the conviction, suggests a strong bias on his part against that gentleman. In these circumstances, it is in the highest degree unfortunate, if nothing more, that Mr. Gladstone should have appointed a relative of Captain Anson as a member of the Committee which he commissioned to advise him on the case. Sir Albert de Rutzen is a cousin of the late Earl of Lichfield, and Captain Anson, the son of the late Earl, is therefore only his cousin one degree removed. Sir Albert de Rutzen's long and honourable record as a London magistrate, of course, places him above any suspicion of being actuated by personal considerations in a quasi-judicial inquiry; but in difficult cases, where pros and cons are pretty evenly balanced, and especially in a case like the present, where what is required is not merely a review of a judicial finding, but advice as to the next steps to be taken, the judgment of the best of men may be unconsciously swayed by personal prepossessions. The Committee in this case have put on record their opinion that the Staffordshire police conducted their investigations, "not for the purpose of finding out who was the guilty party, but for the purpose of finding evidence against Edalji, who, they were already sure, was the guilty man." This expressly confirms what has been alleged again and again as to the police methods which led to Edalji's conviction, and fully justifies the reiterated public demand for an investigation which should include the conduct of the Staffordshire Constabulary; but not a suggestion is made in the report of the Committee that such a course as this is desirable, either in the interests of justice or for the protection of the public, or that any notice should be taken of a misconception of their duties on the part of the police which has exposed an innocent man to seven years' penal servitude. This is a strange omission. In the same connection, one cannot help noting that Mr. Herbert Gladstone himself is a cousin of the wife of Sir Reginald Hardy, who presided over Mr. Edalji's trial, and passed upon him the monstrous sentence above-mentioned—monstrous even if the man had been guilty, as Mr. Akers Douglas recognised when he remitted four years of it. Lady Hardy's father was the elder brother of Mr. W. E. Gladstone. I have been credibly informed that Mr. Herbert Gladstone is also a personal friend of Captain Anson, though I cannot myself vouch for this statement. But, whatever Mr. Gladstone's other connection with parties concerned in the case, it is singularly unfortunate that the Home Secretary, who is responsible for the unsatisfactory character of the inquiry that has taken place, and the apparent miscarriage of justice to which it has led, should be himself a near relative of the magistrate who conducted the trial, and should have appointed a near relative of the Chief Constable of Staffordshire to assist in the inquiry. Even if these features were absent, however, the case as it stands has developed into the dimensions of a public scandal—a scandal affecting directly the due administration of justice, the conduct of the police, and the Home Office method of dealing with cases involving these important questions. It is inevitable now that the whole business should be raised in Parliament. Before that is done it is to be hoped that Members of Parliament will endeavour to familiarise themselves with the cardinal facts of the case, and that when it comes up the House of Commons will deal with the scandal without regard to party or personal considerations.

THE CASH-ON-CREDIT-TERMS TRICK.

On May 8 a paragraph was published in Truth describing a case in which a boy had been taken in by the advertisements and circulars of the Dereham Road Cycle Company, of Norwich, having been led to buy a bicycle on the instalment system under the impression that he would receive the machine on the payment of the first instalment, the fact being that it was not to be delivered until the full payment had been completed. I have received a letter from the firm in question, of which I believe a Mr. Frederick George Potter is the sole proprietor, repudiating my construction of this transaction, and giving the following explanation:—

> You refer to a circular which we send out headed "Yours to ride and enjoy, from 5s. monthly," and that we invite purchasers to note "credit prices," which are shown on the same circular. Please note at those credit prices we supply cycles on the first payment on credit. But with this circular we also send a typewritten letter, also another yellow handbill, on both of which we offer a bicycle at almost half the usual price—namely, £3 15s., by 5s. deposit, and fourteen further payments of 5s., making £3 15s. in all. At this price we only offer to send cycle on the last payment. Therefore, a customer can have a cycle from us on the first or last payment, whichever way he choose to order. Judging by the article in your paper, this officer, in our opinion, did not send you all the papers that we sent to applicant. Your article says, "so far as I can see nothing is said on the circular about sending the cycle on the last payment." Its true it does not, but it does on the typewritten letter that accompanied it. As you put it in your paper, the affair looks very black against us, and lead people to believe that we offer to send a cycle on first payment in order to get their money, and when we have got the money we send them a circular and tell them the cycle is sent on the last payment. This is altogether wrong, for we tell them at first how they can buy it on credit and how they can save pounds by paying for cycle before delivery.

It appears to be the truth that the "company" sends in the first instance a type-written circular containing the words, "We will send this beautiful machine to your address on receipt of 5s. deposit, and upon the payment of the last of fourteen weekly or monthly instalments of 5s. each, making a total of £3 15s. in all." But this very circular goes on to state, "Note our cash with order price is only £3 10s." This clearly implies that £3 10s. is the cash price, and £3 15s. the credit price. The truth is that the terms are wrapped up in such a mass of verbiage that it is extremely difficult for any one to understand precisely what really is meant. The phrase, "We will send this beautiful machine to your address on receipt of 5s. deposit and upon the payment of the last of fourteen weekly or monthly instalments" is itself calculated to mislead, because the machine is not sent upon payment of the deposit; and there is no sense in calling the first instalment a "deposit" (which implies that the payment is a security given against delivery), or saying anything about sending the machine "upon" this payment unless the intention is to convey a false impression. When to this is added that the cash price is £3 10s., but that for payment by instalments the price is £3 15s., the natural inference is that at £3 15s. the machine is supplied on credit. Why should the customer be charged an extra 5s. for the privilege of paying his money some weeks in advance of delivery?

Mr. Potter professes to be highly indignant with my observations on his advertisements, and uses in his letter threatening language, which it is not necessary to reproduce. The answer to him is that he states his terms in forms of words which are calculated to mislead; that similar forms are in common use among trick-advertisers; that in point of fact he has misled people by his ambiguous phrases; and that he makes it a rule to retain the money they have paid under a misapprehension, although they may demand their money back. I referred last August to the case of a customer who had been deceived in this way. The case mentioned on May 8 is of precisely the same kind; and I have independent evidence that many other people have been equally deceived. If, therefore, Mr. Potter desires to relieve himself from unfavourable remarks, either by his customers or by independent observers like myself, the best thing he can do is to cancel all these misleading documents and substitute for them plain statements which are not open to misconstruction, even by the boys and girls who are naturally large customers in this class of trade. Another thing which he had better do is to return money promptly when a customer complains that he did not understand the terms of the bargain. On one of his circulars he expressly states that "any order can be cancelled, but it is understood in doing so that the money paid is forfeited to pay for loss of sale, etc., as we cannot return money to allow customers to go and purchase elsewhere"; and on this rule he acts. This, again, is a common practice in this class of business, and it is not consistent with honest dealing when the customer complains that he has misunderstood the terms of the bargain. The trick of mystifying people by leading them to suppose that they are obtaining goods on credit, subject to payment by instalments, when in point of fact they are to pay the full price before the goods are delivered, is being extensively practised by unscrupulous advertisers; and a firm which does not desire to be suspected of employing the trick should avoid using the machinery by which the trick is ordinarily worked.

Another advertisement of the class just referred to emanates from Cray, Stewart, and Co., of Milton-street, E.C. It relates to our old friend the "beautiful tailor-made skirt," a picture of which adorns the advertisement, with the announcement conspicuously displayed at the side of it, "cash price 6s. 9d., or 1s. weekly." The letterpress reads, "made and sent to any address on receipt of 1s. DEPOSIT and 6d. for postage, with measures, and the balance, 6s., by instalments 1s. weekly, or cash with order price 6s. 9d." On receipt of 1s. 6d. for deposit and postage, the victim gets a printed circular notifying that the skirt has been "put in hand," and incidentally mentioning that "upon the balance being paid" it will be delivered. No unsuspicious person who has not already got an inkling of the trick is likely to read this advertisement without supposing that the article is to be delivered on credit. It is distinctly stated that the skirt is made and sent on receipt of the first payment; the words which follow the statement are not necessarily inconsistent with that reading; and any other construction of the terms is inconsistent with the notification that the cash price is 6s. 9d.—or 9d. less than on payment by instalments. This is the principle of the Dereham Road Cycle Company's terms over again. If the customer pays the whole of the money by instalments in advance of delivery, she is obviously paying cash, and is entitled, if anything, to better terms than the customer who pays the whole sum down in one lump for immediate delivery, seeing that the firm has her money in hand for use at least six weeks before the goods are to be delivered. There can be no conceivable reason, therefore, for charging 9d. extra to the customer who pays by instalments if the money is all to be paid in advance and no credit given. People are always writing to me complaining about advertisements of this class, but I wonder they do not address themselves to the papers which publish them, and which cannot possibly be unaware of the trick that is to be perpetrated by them. This is another good example of the encouragement of misleading advertisements by a certain section of the press—to the detriment of honest trade and honest advertising, and in the long run of newspapers also.

THE THEATRES.

"The Last of His Race," at Drury Lane.

"The Last of His Race," among the Redskins, will probably not be the last of his race by many among similar heroes of the stage. Here, as in most productions at Drury Lane, every opportunity has been given to the writer, Mr. Donald MacLaren. The scenery, especially that of the Lily Pond of Namabin, is really beautiful, and the whole of the second act is a revel for the eye, a series of sylvan symphonies. Act IV. repeats in some senses the effects of its predecessors, and would for that reason be as well away, especially as the climax of the play is reached by the death of Niatawa at the end of the third act. The music which invades the action at its more emotional points is to the taste of the majority of visitors to Drury Lane, and here undoubtedly, as in works which do not rank high as literature or scale the more difficult heights of drama, has its great advantages. It covers up the rents that may have been made by the stage-manager, it helps the players out with their attempt to capture the emotional sympathy of the audience, and being in this case composed by Mr. Arthur Farwell, of Cornell University, who thoroughly understands the theme, and obviously has sympathy with the vanishing race of the Redskins, many will welcome such melodious appearances. Only on the heights of drama do I resent the intrusion of an alien art. I do not want Saint Saëns to play to me when I am admiring a Watteau, nor a Verdi to come with his thoughts about Othello when I am admiring another version of the theme, by Shakespeare. In "The Last of His Race" then, music is in its place, for although Mr. McLaren adopts the metrical decasyllabic form, occasionally lapsing into the pleasant sing-song of Longfellow's Hiawatha, he does not thereby achieve the presence of the Muse of Poetry, a shy immortal, apt to excuse herself from the feast, and to prefer picnicking on some little hill with any "careless boy" who "has learned to be content without her," and made no elaborate preparations for her entertainment; doting, as she does, upon "a soul at ease." Of literary quality there is little, of dramatic quality not much in "The Last of His Race."

The vanishing race must have often appealed to the present owners of American soil, and our neighbours have recently furnished us with two plays, both inspired with the same theme. I chronicled here my impressions of "Strongheart" only the week before last. In "The Last of his Race" we are all the time in the region of the Great Lakes, while in "Strongheart" the action passes at the University and elsewhere in surrounding civilisation. But the pathos of the two plays comes from the same source. In "Strongheart," the young chief has won the heart of the beautiful white American girl, but is forced to resign her hand at the call of his fellow-countrymen. Here we have no young chief, but a fair maiden, Adulola, the only child of Lonawonda. The first act passes in the attempt on the part of the old chief to secure for her the most worthy of husbands. The scene at the Lily Pond is full of innocencies, and it must be admitted that the eye is more interested in admiring the scenery of the forest than is the brain in watching the development of Matawagnon's jealousy of Lonawonda, leading him to dissent alone from the decision of the other chiefs, who agree to the terms of Lonawonda. This ends in his murder at the hands of the old chief, who becomes blind himself as he slays his enemy. I liked the performance of Mr. Austin Melford as the drunken old warrior Matawagnon, a sort of character which Mr. Melford has shown himself capable of rendering on more than one previous occasion. There is more than one effort made towards relieving tension by means somewhat trivial, such as the scene by the pond, where the young women are bathing, and where one of these loses her garments, replaced, after much palaver and apparently much difficulty, by the virgin Adulola. Miss Constance Collier as the chieftain's daughter added fresh laurels to the collection she has made in the past few years. She has rarely given a finer performance, certainly none equal to this since her Nancy in "Oliver Twist." Her love scenes with Mr. Basil Gill, who wins her maiden's heart, especially, were excellent on both sides, and Mr. Gill may be congratulated on looking his romantic part to perfection. When things go wrong, as they are bound to do in this kind of melodramatic romance before they can go right again, it appears that the beloved of Adulola has had an intrigue with a married lady before he met her. It is true that we are given to understand his ignorance of the marriage vows having been uttered by this lady, but that is all rather thin, and too obviously put in to make sure of the sympathy of the audience. Divorce proceedings are not the fashion among the Redskins, and the lady's husband procures an order for the burning of her lover at the stake. He is securely tied, and the flames are on the point of rising, when Adulola arrives and severs his bonds. He does not, however, escape his fate, but falls in battle, and with him falls the interest of the play, which, however, is spun out into three scenes which appeal rather to the eye than to the intellect. In this production the players, other than the few I have named, all fulfilled their parts adequately, the scenic effects, as I have said, were fine, and the literary and dramatic quality of the piece is most leniently described as mediocre.

THE COMPLETE CATECHIST.

The Dressmaker's Catechism.

(For the Use of Would-be Fashionable Modistes.)

Question: Who are you?

Answer: A fashionable dressmaker.

Q.: What is a fashionable dressmaker?

A.: A native Parisienne, born in London, of English parents, who has lived all her life within the four-mile radius.

Q.: By what distinguishing features is your Parisian nativity made apparent?

A.: By my Parisian name, with its prefix of Madame, and also by the pure Parisian French with which I take care to intersperse my show-room conversation.

Q.: Do you speak your pure Parisian French with the pure Parisian accent?

A.: Yes—so far as my English customers are any the wiser.

Maloja, Engadine, Switzerland.—Palace Hotel, Kursaal, 6,000 ft. altitude. Completely renovated 1906. Private Baths. Golf. Tennis.—Edward Smart, Manager. Prospectus on application.

Q.: Who are your English customers?

A.: Some are ladies of the Great World; others, women of the wealthy and aspiring Middle Classes.

Q.: What is the difference between the two?

A.: In the latter case, it is always the women's husbands who discharge my accounts. In the former case it is usually the ladies' admirers.

Q.: How comes it that the husbands of the latter thus relegate their first marital duty—the discharge of their wives' dressmakers' accounts—to a third party?

A.: Either because they have not the money themselves, or, if they have, they require it for paying the dressmakers' accounts of other men's wives.

Q.: Illustrate by an example.

A.: Avec beaucoup de plaisir, as we say over in Paree. The Duke of X. dresses Mrs. Y. Z., and Mr. Y. Z. returns the compliment by dressing the Duchess of X.

Q.: Have you any objection to this system of mixed dressing?

A.: None whatever. On the contrary, it is all to my advantage.

Q.: How so?

A.: Because by letting me into these little family arrangements they place their reputations in my power, and so preclude themselves from kicking at the amount of my charges.

Q.: On what basis do you calculate your charges?

A.: On two bases—the husband-basis and the admirer-basis.

Q.: What is the husband-basis?

A.: To figure out the gross cost of material and labour, and then add on a hundred per cent. for the moral value of my name upon the skirt-band or bill-head.

Q.: What is the admirer-basis?

A.: The same as the husband-basis, with an additional hundred per cent. tacked on for secrecy.

Q.: What are the fashions?

A.: The styles which change year by year, and to which it is imperative for every woman who does not wish to be thought antediluvian to conform.

Q.: Who sets the fashions?

A.: I do.

Q.: By what consideration, chiefly, are you guided in setting them?

A.: By the desire to make them so unlike the fashions of last season, that it shall be quite impossible for any woman with a weakness for mean and petty economies to réchauffer her last year's frocks into this season's creations.

Q.: Are all frocks creations?

A.: All my frocks are creations. All other dressmakers' frocks are merely imitations.

Q.: What is a fictitious creation?

A.: A creation which is charged in the bill as a frock and supplied to the customer in the form of cash on loan.

Q.: Does the husband or the admirer always know what he is paying for?

A.: Very seldom. It is not well for the husband or the admirer to know too much.

Q.: Why so?

A.: Because, if he did, he would probably decline to continue a husband, and would certainly cease to remain an admirer.

Q.: Would you be sorry to see such a state of affairs come about?

A.: I should be very sorry.

Q.: For what reason?

A.: Because it is to the husband, and still more to the admirer, that I have to look for the payment of my lady customers' accounts.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

AN ACADEMICIAN FROM THE LAW COURTS.

THE new Academician, Maître Barboux, is seventy-three, and a singularly lively party. His mind is of the Voltairean complexion, but sweetened with natural amiability and favourable conditions. No dinner party could be dull, Maître Barboux present. He has nerve power enough to call back to life all the sleepers in the Valley of Jehoshaphat. There is something of the sparrow in his temperament. He is remarkably well set-up, is always carefully dressed, though in a touring suit, and might be dapper were he not so prodigiously intellectual. He was never known to tell the same story twice, or to be without a first-rate story on the tip of his tongue ready to be reeled off with a flash of wit; and he can be pathetic. I heard him plead in this tone for a M. Décinge, a notary at Asnières, brother of Mme. Veuve Crespin, otherwise Du Gast, then the fiancée of the present Prince de Sagan. She was the image of the Empress Eugénie in her prime, had the prestige of the endless millions left her by her late husband, and a rather undesirable name as the owner of tenement working-class houses. She had had her brother up before the correctional tribunal on the charge of forging a will in her father's name with the intention of robbing her. The case against him broke down completely. As M. Barboux returned home, Prince de Sagan, who had lain in wait for him, assaulted him, to avenge the lady for her defeat, and a week or so later took his place on the banc des accusés in the Correctional Court. Maître Barboux scorned the vengeance offered him. The marriage announced on the occasion as impending has not yet taken place though three years have since come and gone.

Maître Barboux generally confines himself to civil affairs. He has no ambition save to excel at his profession and to cultivate his critical faculty as a scholar. A strong mind, a delicate and a refined taste, and a winged and playful fancy, render him a unique speaker. He was a great friend of Waldeck-Rousseau, and, without being a political ally, fell in with his political ideas and intellectual Republicanism. The cranium, forehead, brows, eyes, nose, mouth, and contour, his upright carriage and independent air, proclaim him one of Nature's aristocrats. There is so much charm in appearance and manner that nobody could envy him his success. The mouth is marvellously well shaped for the use to which he turns it. I have been, as I write, beating my brain to remember what face he reminds me of. A very fine engraving of the poet Moore rises in my memory. Maître Barboux is passionately fond of poetry, and believes that, had he been in youth too poor to go to the Bar, he might have had some success as a lyric poet. He is passionately fond of Victor Hugo's lyrical works. When bâtonnier of the Paris Bar he never tired of advising young barristers to read good poetry, and when they liked it to commit it to memory, not to quote, but to keep in mind something purely beautiful. Like most Parisians pur sang, he has certain guttural tones—they call it here a grasseyement. It has been said that they proceed from his having picked up the pebbles Demosthenes used, and that in using them in turn, they stuck in his throat. He is kindness itself, and an affectionate friend. He pleaded in the civil side of the Merelli case, and Maître Henri Robert in the criminal proceedings.

The Confederation of Southern Vignerons, or owners of the vines they cultivate, is no flash in the pan. It may go farther than you imagine. The whole country from the Gironde to Béziers is in the movement. I know very well the south-west of the Rhone, and never went there without bringing away the conviction that any accident of widespread consequence might bring about Home Rule dislocation. The difference between the South and North of France is greater than between England and Ireland, whether as regards race, historical evolution, or affinities. The South still retains its Gallo-Roman character. Its retentive historical memory is sustained by the monuments which preceded the French conquest. The sight of them feeds enthusiasm for the greatness of former days. The revival of open-air plays at Orange, Béziers, Nîmes, Arles, Carcasonne, and other places, has aroused an autonomous sentiment supposed here to be dead, but only asleep. They are in the South a handsome, hearty, imaginative people, un peuple de braves gens, proud of their Venus of Arles, which surpasses in sculptural form the Venus of Milo, and of her fair descendants. In the way of serious, dignified beauty I know of no young women comparable to those of Béziers. Imperial race is really stamped on their appearance. I remember once winning a pair of gloves of a Belgian artist whom I defied to point out to me a single girl or young woman at the Sunday promenade on the Cours with an ill-shaped, or at all defective, mouth. Nearly every Southern who has not some strong personal interest for treating bygones as bygones complains of the oppression of the South by the North. You hear people talk of the monstrous ruthlessness of Simon de Montfort and Saint Louis, as you might in some parts of Ireland of that of Cromwell. Freethinkers of education let their imaginations run on the opportunity of effecting a great religious reformation that Saint Louis took from the South, as it turned out, for the glory and benefit of the German Luther. Protestantism coming out of a southern cradle would have been sunny, graceful, and delightful, with all the arts pressed into its service, and a religion of joy tempered with reason, instead of the disputatious wrangler that we know it. If Saints Louis and Dominic could come to life again in the South, they would have to put up with rude treatment. I have known of whole families refusing to attend the Corpus Christi procession because Innocent III., the persecutor of the South, "invented" the doctrine of the Real Presence. Otherwise they were fervent Catholics. Innocent preached the crusade into which Saint Louis threw himself, and sent Dominic to set up the Inquisition in the southern cities.

I do not see why the Federal system should not rule in France as in Germany. It would have ruled at the time of the Revolution but for the combined attack of the monarchies on the French Republic. The ideal of the Girondins was liberty in diversity. Robespierre represented barbarous pedantry and the Procrustean system in his France une et indivisible. The guillotine gave but a temporary solution to the Federal idea that is now leavening the South.

A friend who was about a good deal with the Colonial Premiers has been giving me his impressions of them. As individual men he thought highly of them, and saw in Sir W. Laurier the perfection of the silver-tongue type. The appearance of Sir Robert Bond struck him as a counterpart of that of Sir Michael Hicks Beach. But he did not like their keenness for preferential duties at the cost of the Old Country for the benefit of the New. "Give, give," seemed to him behind their every thought. He did not see Botha. The Premiers seemed to hope that Birmingham would have the last word in the controversy on preferential duties. This opinion has somehow gained ground abroad. In this connection the present fiscal condition of France is worthy of the closest study. Let me say something more about it as a warning to those who, from ignorance or indolence, may suffer Birmingham to lead them away.

On every side one hears complaints of the increased cost of living. The grievance is but too genuine. Discontent is rife everywhere. It would surprise me were there not a national crisis in two or three years more. The rise in prices was at first confined to overpopulous localities. It is now general, has affected necessaries of life, luxuries, raw materials, everything. In some cases—copper, for instance, and this reacts on pinchbeck jewellery, artistic bronzes, and much else connected with l'article de Paris—the dearness is international. In most cases, however, it is due to French conditions. Foremost among them are protection, militarism, improvident and wasteful finances, strikes, unionism, and labour legislation rushed with feather-headed levity.

The Méline tariffs began by demoralising politics. It was a combined attack of landlords and manufacturers, of the Cercle des Pommes de Terre and Notre Dame de l'Usine, on the public purse. Those who attacked could do nothing without voters. They created organisations, Conservative at bottom, with the Republican label to persuade the voters to return patriotic Deputies, promising them, if they did so, a share of the plunder in the form of higher wages. Wages did not go up. But the working classes have now got it into their heads that politics are a scramble for loaves and fishes, and in no other respect serious. They would now think the same in England had the last general election turned out differently.

More than one manufacturer has told me that he can trace the unrest and discontent of his operatives to the workings of the Méline tariffs, which were carried through their votes, while their employers got all the benefits. This feeling stimulated unionism, the latest embodiment of which has been the General Labour Confederation, whose attitude is one of hostility towards all employers. It is now the turn for employers to feel uneasy and dissatisfied. Labour unions have been a direct incentive to employers' unions. At the present hour trusts are being formed in every branch of manufactures. They are more or less occult, such combinations being illegal. The scramble, the signal for which was given seventeen years ago by M. Méline, is continuing, and, notwithstanding the apparent success of the workmen, I rather think the employers have the better of it.

An example has just been given me by a friend in the cotton trade. He says that, owing to the dearness of raw material, the weavers have found their expenses increased by 10 per cent. But they recoup by increasing their profits to the extent of 25 per cent., and are just now piling up fortunes which M. Caillaux's income tax Bill promises to protect. All this is preparing a serious state of things, because there is an administrative burning of the candle at both ends. The word "deficit" ended the monarchical cycle. It may bring to a close the industrial cycle, such as has existed for the last eighty years.

The cotton manufacturer I have cited has just come from Germany. He says a similar state of things is springing up there, and that State credit—particular and Imperial, especially the latter—is everywhere shaken. Save in the ruined vineyards of the South, the French working classes are still better off in having better food than the Germans, who are sacrificed to the landlords both in town and country. But in the towns the German operatives are better housed. Indeed, they are better housed than middle-class people in France considerably above the Caillaux taxation line. They have, in spite of their swarming families, sufficient room (to speak only of Berlin and Leipsic), hot-water heating, electric light, and good culinary contrivances. But the food is atrocious. My friend saw the young Duchess of Saxe-Coburg go herself round the butchers' shops, with a lady at her side and a servant provided with a market basket following. She bargained just like a workman's wife, and did not disdain what is known in London as cats' meat, scrags of mutton, hocks of beef, and what the French term the faleron of the ox—that is to say, the part that poets might call the dewlap.

The same informant tells me that Coburg contains more old maiden ladies and cats than any other Saxon city. The cats have been disappearing, and doubtless serve in the cheaper restaurants in lieu of butcher's meat. The Duchess of Saxe-Coburg, in view of the dearness of meat, sees herself to the carving of portions for the different tables of her household.

M. Rouvier found a great situation on his last retirement from office as president of a joint stock bank. Probably the inability of M. Caillaux to bring les grandes fortunes within the net of his fiscal scheme may have a similar effect. It is hardly eighteen months ago since Rouvier tore a passion to tatters in defending in the tribune of the Palais Bourbon the "rights" of the Murats, Berthiers (Wagrams), and other nobles of Napoleonic creation to the sum of about 17,000,000 fr., for which they were ready to compound with him for their majorats, also of Napoleonic creation and a hundred years old. The Chamber thought the terms ridiculously high. The single argument M. Rouvier could adduce would have applied just as well to the ex-Empress and the sons of the late Prince Napoleon. It was: "These majorats (perpetual pensions to eldest sons) are inscribed in Le Grand Livre. Rather than dishonour this engagement I prefer to quit office." Though the Ministry trembled for its life and could not, every one knew, hold on much longer, the Chamber shrugged its shoulders and voted the money claimed by Rouvier for a wholly worthless nest of Bonapartists. The sum thus given away exceeded what M. Caillaux hopes to net (see his letter to Pelletan) on incomes in excess of 100,000 fr.

M. Caillaux has no such reverence for Le Grand Livre. In his letter, meant to explain to the committee presided over by M. Pelletan, he makes no longer any secret of his intention to clip rente, just, he might have added to forestall reactionist taunts, as Saint Louis and Philippe le Bel clipped the gold and silver coin of their day. Another of his avowals which must bring political ruin on Jaurès, who has been defending Caillaux tooth and nail, is that the middle-class must bear the weight of the two milliards a year that he hopes to raise through taxing their incomes. By middle-class the Finance Minister means the class below the 100,000 frs. line and slightly above starvation point. The taxable income from capital begins at 150 frs. and from land farmed personally by the peasant owner at 600 frs. M. Caillaux has waived the proposal to tax salaries in provincial towns of 1,300 frs., 1,500 frs., and 1,800 frs. respectively, but insists on bringing within his trawl-net salaries of 2,000 frs. in the provinces and of 2,500 frs. in Paris. He will be less inquisitorial in dealing with private banks, but refuses to mitigate the gabelle system of peering into private incomes—middle-class, of course, as above defined. Should that class suffer by the Caillaux fiscality, there will be reversion to the general state of France towards the end of the sixth century. All the Gallo-Roman slaves had then risen from serfdom and all the citizens, great and small, had descended to the situation of serfs. Above the huge mass of perfectly equal human beings were the caste of Frankish conquerors. We may one of these days discover in them foreshadows of the beer-saloon, railway, banking, gold, steel, and copper kings with Teuton names and throats whom the trawler Caillaux is unable to net.

A PEER AMONG THE POLITICIANS.

I DON'T know whether I am not rather a juggins to confess it, but I have made an ass of myself this week. I thought I had got on the track of something really startling, but it turned out to be a false scent after all, and so I got rather badly left. It was like this. I daresay you read that Lord Ampthill, in a speech last week, said that nearly all the Indian riots and things were got up in this country. I didn't quite see what he meant at the time, but it set me thinking whether I couldn't find out something about the people who got them up. I made inquiries, without giving myself away too much, of course, and I very soon got on the track of what looked as if it might turn out to be something. There is a sort of cousin of my mother's—an Indian major, returned-empty sort of person—you know the kind of man. I was talking about the Indian question to him, and to my surprise he told me there wasn't the slightest mystery about it at all, that all the Indian disturbances were got up at one of the big political clubs, one that I expect you would recognise if I told you the name, because it is quite close to Charing Cross. According to my mother's cousin, it is a notorious hot-bed for all kinds of treasons and rebellions and things, so much so that, in his own words—or as nearly as you would be likely to print them—if half the members—there are five or six thousand of them altogether, I'm told—were led out on to the Embankment and shot down with Maxim guns, it would put back the breaking-up of the Empire for another three centuries. He told me a good deal more about the club and its members, and I got the idea that, if I could once get inside without being spotted, I might be able to find out all about the Indian rebellion, and perhaps save no end of trouble by publishing it all in Truth.

The difficult thing was to get inside, because, of course, whatever people might take me for, they would never think I was a politician. But, according to the major, you don't have to belong to the club at all to get inside, so long as you work it properly. All you have to do is to put on a cloth cap and a muffler and say you are a Labour Member, and they will let you go anywhere. So I talked it over with Jessie, and she thought out a way, which seemed safe enough. She made me up for the part in a ready-made suit of tweeds and a bowler hat three sizes too large for me and a bright red necktie and a very large imitation gold watch-chain. I walked down to the club—I should very much like to tell you the name, but, of course, I haven't got to the bottom of the plot yet—if there is one—so it wouldn't be wise. But it is quite close to Charing Cross. Jessie made me keep a small pebble in my mouth, so as to change my voice, and, of course, I dropped all the h's I could remember. We had hit upon the name of one of the North-Country members of Parliament who was a member of the club, and I was to ask for him; but when I got there, I found about a dozen other men, dressed like myself, in the front hall, waiting for another M.P., so I hung on to them, and it worked like a charm. I was supposed to be one of a deputation of Trades Unionists or something, and as soon as we got inside I slipped away, and nobody asked me any questions or anything. Took me for one of the members I suppose, which was what I wanted. It certainly is a queer club—all got up inside with enamelled tiles, like a milk-shop for one thing. And in the place where you wash your hands they've got a pair of nail-scissors chained to the wall with a long chain. Afraid some of the members will fall in love with them and steal them, I suppose. But that isn't what I really want to write about.

After I'd wandered about for a bit, trying to find where I was, I followed a couple of men into a huge smoke-room. It was really a splendid room, and crowded with members, and I realised at once that if I was going to find out the Indian plotters it would be there or nowhere. There were several things about the people there that struck me as suspicious. For one thing, scarcely any of them seemed to be speaking English. It was nearly all German; or when it wasn't, it was English spoken with a German accent. I thought I had got into an Empire League meeting or a Tariff Reform demonstration by mistake, at first; but the real truth is, I suppose, that the Germans—and especially the German Jews—are the people who take most interest in politics on both sides. Another thing that I noticed was that there were quite a number of clergymen, only nearly all of them wore little white ties, tied like German waiters, instead of the usual choky sort of collars, and I'm afraid I don't know enough about religion to know exactly where the difference comes in. One thing that made me feel that I was on the right track was that there were several coloured people of one kind or another scattered about the room. Two of them were negroes, very black indeed, and the rest were various shades of brown. They all wore European clothes, though, and seemed to be making themselves quite at home, so I suppose they were members all right. I think that was all that struck me about the club, except the waiters. There were a lot of little round tables about the room, each of them with a little bell on it that the members rang when they wanted drinks and things. They kept on ringing all the time, and the waiters kept on not coming. After a member had been ringing for half an hour perhaps a waiter would come near him by accident and take his order, and then go away and not come back at all. And the waiters had the haughtiest faces of any one I have ever seen, except perhaps an L.C.C. tram conductor. I expect they were politicians, too, and realised that the members daren't go for them, in case they should lose their votes.

I amused myself no end all the afternoon watching the politicians, but I'm bound to say I couldn't overhear anything like a conspiracy to turn us out of India. I got close to a couple of Parsees, I think they were, in one of the window alcoves, so as to overhear what they were talking about. But they weren't conspiring; they were arguing why it was that patent leather boots make your feet ache in hot weather.

Not very far away from them there were three men—one of them with a strong German accent—whom I thought looked promising, so I strolled near them in a sort of careless way. This was what one of them—the Germanified one—was saying: "I chust tell zem I don' care a snapp of ze finger for zem or zair zociety neizer, and if zey don' like ze waches I pay zem zey gan go elzewhere and get more. Zink zey gan dyrranize ofer me. Vy, for two pinz I glose down my Lunton vorks altogezzer, and take zem outside ze Lunton district. Trates unions, inteet. Pfui! I schow zem!"

It was the same everywhere. There were about a dozen men sitting in a big circle in the middle of the room—red-faced, beefy sort of people—and it struck me they might have chosen the most conspicuous place for conspiring, because it was the last sort of place you would expect to find them in. But they were only discussing what whisky is really made of, and whether it ought to be made in a pot-still or a patent-still.

Then there was one of the parsons—but I dare say lots of your readers have been to the place themselves, and know more about the sort of silly rot they talk there than I do myself. And any way, either I didn't hit upon one of their Indian conspiracy days, or else they spotted me and purposely changed the conversation when they saw me, or else Lord Ampthill and my mother's cousin have been talking a lot of rot, and Indian hooligan conspiracies are not hatched in big London political clubs at all. On the whole, I expect that that's about the truth of it. And so does Jessie. But I'm sorry my article didn't come off better, because I'm sure it would have made a big stir.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

A CRIMINAL Education, dear Lady Betty, is one of the urgent necessities of the moment in this country, especially at either end of the social system; amongst those who may not undertake ordinary work because they are too well-conditioned, and amongst those who cannot obtain ordinary employment because they are too ill-conditioned.

Our well-connected litter must be dealt with. There is a brilliant prospect for the educated burglar, the polished pick-pocket, the titled thief, and the "society" swindler; the successes of their immediate predecessors as directors of illegitimate concerns, assistants to fraudulent company promoters, and touts to unscrupulous stock-brokers prove that the necessary qualities are not absent.

The criminal profession has been much maligned, and this is the more difficult to explain as most of the founders of great families attained wealth and position by murdering their opponents, robbing their neighbours, and defrauding the community. Those who are occupied with the wholesale, however, always despise those who are occupied with the retail, and this affectation may partly account for the prejudice entertained against the ordinary malefactor. The day of the magnificent crime is past; it is only by the accumulation of petty offences that we can now secure fame, wealth, position, and influence.

The Danger to Health of obesity is not sufficiently emphasised. Stout people should know that "fatty degeneration" of the heart and liver is a constant menace to them. The Sketch, in writing about Antipon, says:—"This pleasant, rational, and most efficacious remedy may be warmly recommended to stout persons, as much for health's sake as for the attainment of perfect elegance of figure." Price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. per bottle, of all chemists, or of The Antipon Company, 13, Olmar-street, London, S.E.

The pursuit even of ordinary crime develops many of the qualities which are admired amongst us at the moment. The most commonplace burglar must possess courage, resource, endurance, enterprise, considerable foresight, and much self-control—all qualities which football and the other forms of sport so much cultivated by the well-connected in this country require and encourage. It must be remembered that as no examination is necessary to obtain employment in this direction, the ordinary athletic course common at all our public schools is sufficient training for the purpose. Moreover, favouritism will for long still be a considerable element in the situation so far as the well-connected criminal is concerned; the Government is disinclined to prosecute, family influence will be exerted to shield the offender, and the rich sufferers will generally welcome the titled or fashionable burglar, even if he visits them at the most inconvenient hours of the night.

The time, indeed, approaches when the following announcement may be read in "The Fashionable Intelligence" column in our newspapers:—

"Mr. and Mrs. Gorgius Midas entertained at daybreak yesterday a small party of impromptu visitors, amongst whom were the Duke of ——, Lord Charles —— ——, and the Hon Ferdinand ——. The burglar-alarm bells played admirably."

To be robbed by such a distinguished group would be a social success of the first magnitude. There are those who would even pay a considerable sum to such "criminals" to make an attempt upon their property.

The profession which is recommended here has another advantage; it provides for the unsuccessful. A commodious gaol, wholesome and sufficient nourishment, unremitting attention, the absence of the complicated cares which rage in the world without, the best medical advice free of cost, and highly-trained nursing—it is a pension to the incompetent. It has always been a British "Upper-class" principle that the elder sons of its members should live on the estate; the younger on the State. In gaol the latter admirable condition would still be fulfilled.

A new translation of the "Odes of Horace," by a classical scholar of importance, has for ages past been a literary event, and it will be so long as civilisation continues. Dr. John Marshall, the Rector of the Royal High School, Edinburgh, has translated the Odes into English verse corresponding with the original metre, and the volume will shortly be published simultaneously by G. P. Putnam in New York and by J. M. Dent and Co. in London. The ode on "Old Times and New"—Book II., xv.—may be quoted here, not only for the charm of its rendering, but to remind the world that the cultivated Romans of the day deplored, as much as we do now, the activities of the villa fiend:—

"Soon few for tilth the acres will remain,
"Such princely piles we raise. On every side
"Fishponds, than Lucrine lake more wide,
"We'll see. The bachelor-plane

"Will oust vine-wedded elms; and violets blue,
"And myrtle's fragrance, and flower-scents untold,
"Will scatter sweetness, where of old
"The owner olives grew.

"Soon sultry sunshine by thick-planted bays
"Will be shut off. Not so taught Romulus' rule,
"Or the unshaven Cato's school,
"And old folks' simpler ways.

"With them men's private wealth was scant indeed,
"But great the common good. No colonnade
"With northern outlook yielded shade,
"To please a private greed.

"None dared for house-building chance turf eschew;
"Cities and public temples, these at most
"The laws bade deck at public cost
"With pomp of stonework new."

The fears of the Radicals of the time were justified; Rome and the Romans were more remote from disaster when:—

". . . Men's private wealth was scant indeed,
"But great the common good."

The well-known artist, Monsieur Jules Cayron, whose portraits of celebrated beauties in Parisian society were exhibited in London last season, is now showing a series of drawings of famous Englishmen and Englishwomen of the time, at the Graves Galleries, 6, Pall Mall. Amongst the latter are the portrait of Lady Dorothy Nevill, a reproduction of which figures as the frontispiece to her recently published and most successful "Reminiscences," a charming portrait of the Queen of Spain, drawn just before her marriage, and those of two most fascinating girls, Miss Janie Tuohy and Mlle. Amelot de Ségur. The portraits of Lord Carrington and of Lady Alexandra and Lady Victoria Carrington have already attracted much attention.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

NEXT week will be practically engrossed by Epsom, and, after so heavy a meeting, it is really preposterous folly for the Stewards of the Jockey Club to have sanctioned a one day fixture at Kempton Park. The most voracious appetite for racing will surely have been satisfied when Friday's card at Epsom is exhausted, and trainers and jockeys would be glad of a well-earned rest. However, there is the same fatuous arrangement in both Ascot and Goodwood weeks. The Saturday after a big meeting ought always to be left blank.

There were 100 entries for the Woodcote Stakes of £1,000 when this race closed last October, and forty-nine two-year-olds are left in; the list of animals withdrawn including Pom, whose owner is represented by the dark colt White Eagle, by Gallinule out of Merry Gal. This highly-bred colt must have been well thought of as a yearling, as he was entered for fifty races, the Woodcote being his first engagement. If White Eagle is backed by the stable it may reasonably be assumed that he has been well tried, in which case he ought to win, as Mr. Hall Walker has a fair line of the two-year-old form through Pom. The best public performers in this race are St. Elf and Cinderello. It is probable, however, that Rambling Rector will now be in better racing condition than when he ran at Newmarket a few weeks ago. The King, who had originally six entries, has accepted with Simpatica, own sister to Slim Lad, and with Perspective, by Persimmon out of Spyglass, but I do not fancy that either of these animals is likely to be dangerous. Lord Rosebery has three left in, one being Lauderdale, who is own brother to Lavengro, and another Alistair, by Ladas out of Alizarine, who won a trial the other day. Baron Maurice de Rothschild's Le Sage is half-brother, by Ayrshire to Sagamore, and he was purchased last July at the sale of Sir James Miller's yearlings for 710 gs. Sir D. Cooper may start Lesbia, whose début will be watched with much interest, as she is own sister to Flair. Sir E. Vincent's Peradventure, by Persimmon out of Queen of the Rivers, has been well galloped at Newmarket. Mr. Raphael has Zaïda, by Sainfoin out of Aida, a filly bred by Sir James Miller, at whose sale she was purchased by her present owner for 1,200 gs. If White Eagle is good enough to win this race he will, of course, go also for the Coventry Stakes at Ascot, as he would not incur a penalty by winning at Epsom.

There were 111 entries for the Caterham Plate of £200 on Wednesday, and no fewer than seventy-five animals are left in, the result being that the entrances paid by the owners amount to £261, so the race does not cost the fund one penny. Lucian and Littledale are the best public performers, but it will not need a flyer from the dark lot to beat this pair.

For the Great Surrey Foal Stakes of £1,000 there were 100 entries when the race closed in October, 1905, and forty-two are left in. Vega is said to have been reserved for this race. Lord Rosebery may be dangerous with Alistair if the colt is kept for this engagement. It should be noted that Pom was struck out of this race on March 26, and Mr. Hall Walker's only representative is Master Magpie, by Gallinule out of Meddlesome, who is sure to be dangerous if he is fancied by his party.

The Acorn Stakes of £1,000 has fifty-two fillies left in out of an original entry of ninety. The list of acceptances includes Duegna, Peradventure, Flitaway, Vega, Little Goose, and Lesbia. I hear, however, that Lord Rosebery is likely to win this race with Popinjay, who was highly tried at Newmarket the other day. This filly is half-sister, by St. Frusquin, to Traquair, and she is believed to be very smart indeed. It will be remembered that Traquair's brilliant début took place last year in the Woodcote Stakes, and he followed up his success at Epsom by winning the Coventry Stakes at Ascot, a double event which has been very often achieved, the coup being much facilitated by the fact that winners carry no extra weight in the Ascot race.

Twenty-three horses are left in for the Coronation Cup on Thursday, which race will be worth over £1,700 to the winner. This will really be the great event of the week from the purely sporting point of view, if it brings out Keystone II., Polymelus, Velocity, The White Knight, Troutbeck, Polar Star, and Beppo. The list of acceptances also includes Spearmint, Llangibby, Radium, and Challacombe, but their chances need not be considered. The best horses engaged will meet at weight for age, and the race is run over the Derby course. Keystone II. should be properly fit next week, but she was ridiculously backward when she collapsed so lamentably during the Newmarket First Spring Meeting in the race for the March Stakes. I suspect, however, that Lord Derby's mare has not trained on as well as can be desired, and a hint has reached me that Polymelus may not have retained his excellent form of last autumn. Polar Star is tolerably sure to start favourite for the Coronation Cup if he is all right, but I shall anticipate the victory of The White Knight, who is probably the best four-year-old now in training in England.

The Derby is not exciting much attention, as it has come to be generally regarded as a "one horse" race. Some of the papers continue to print beguiling fictions about Ouadi Halfa, it being stated that (1) his trainer has backed the French colt, (2) that M. E. Blanc has already ordered a special train to be ready to convey his colt from Chantilly to Boulogne directly after the race for the Prix du Jockey Club next Sunday. I am informed, on excellent authority, that it is exceedingly improbable that Ouadi Halfa will run at Epsom, no matter whether he wins or loses next Sunday's race. In any case it is impossible to believe that a colt can win at Epsom on Wednesday after having run at Chantilly (and probably a really severe race) on the previous Sunday, with a long journey by land and sea in the interval. M. E. Blanc cannot send Myram (the brother to Jardy) to England, as the colt is lame. Mordant, M. Ephrussi's candidate, cannot stay beyond a mile. It is the opinion of some of the best judges of racing in France that Ouadi Halfa will be defeated for the Prix du Jockey Club, and that the finish for this race will lie between M. Aumont's Pernod and M. Wysocki's Binion. The latter of these colts is a good stayer, and his recent form proves him to be very smart. Binion, who is by Le Pompon, is half-brother to Prestige, who defeated Pretty Polly for the Prix du Conseil Municipal. M. Viel Picard has just purchased a half share in Binon for 80,000 fr., and the colt will run at Chantilly in his name and colours. Slieve Gallion has been going on as well as possible since his race for the Two Thousand, and I hear that he has certainly improved during the last month. The Beckhampton stable is in such excellent form that if Darling desired to ascertain how Slieve Gallion stands in relation to Polar Star he would find no difficulty in doing so. I have always been of the opinion that Slieve Gallion would win the Two Thousand and Derby if he trained on, and never for a moment did I attach a particle of importance to his defeat in the Middle Park Plate. Galvani is going well enough in his work, such as it is, but he certainly has not been subjected to a severe course of training. Galvani has always appeared to tire towards the close of his gallops when going over a mile, and I expect Major Loder's colt will turn out to be a non-stayer.

All Black, Linacre, Charles Edward, The Welkin, and Earlston may all start next Wednesday, but they will be hopelessly outclassed, judging from their public form. Galleot's running in the Two Thousand is declared to have been all wrong, but I do not expect to see this colt figure prominently in the Derby. St. Petersburg is said to be a certain starter, in spite of his recent defeat by Maya, but this mare did not show her best form in the One Thousand, and it is likely that she will be a formidable opponent to Witch Elm in the Oaks if she comes fit and well to the post. St. Petersburg is a strong tip for a place, and it is at least certain that he will be in much better racing trim at Epsom than he was at Newmarket. He is a big, heavy colt, and wants a lot of work before he can be regarded as thoroughly fit. Last summer, when every one was thrown into hysterics of enthusiasm about the performances of Traquair, it was predicted in Truth that Bezonian would turn out to be Lord Rosebery's best three-year-old this season, and so it has come about. Bezonian is very much fancied at Newmarket, and he has been doing well on a very strong preparation. He appears to be well endowed with stamina. I see it is stated that Slieve Gallion will find Bezonian a very different horse at Epsom, so great has been the improvement in the Newmarket colt. People who cackle in this hare-brained fashion overlook the fact that Slieve Gallion may justifiably be expected to have improved also during the five weeks which will have elapsed between the two races. It is mere drivel to gabble about the improvement in some of the probable starters, apparently assuming that for their benefit the favourite will have been so obliging as to stand still at the point of form which he had reached on the Two Thousand day. I cannot see how Bezonian can be expected to defeat Slieve Gallion in the Derby, considering the hollow manner in which Captain Greer's colt won the Two Thousand, and it seems to me that the Epsom course will suit the one horse just as well as the other.

Orby, who is to be ridden by J. Reiff, has shown good form in Ireland, but he is more likely to win the £2,000 Atlantic Stakes at Liverpool in July than the Derby. A colt often gains a flagrantly exaggerated reputation by winning several races easily, but when one is considering the chances of such an animal for a classic stake it is above all things necessary to pay close attention to the class of the animals which he has beaten. I see it is stated that Orby is greatly superior to his stable companion, Hayden, who won in Ireland the other day, but such form as this cannot be regarded as conclusive by any practical man. In 1871 Mr. Chaplin's Steppe finished second to Hannah for the One Thousand. Her owner had a Derby candidate in The Pearl, a daughter of Newminster and Caller Ou, which he had leased from Mr. I'Anson. When The Pearl had given Steppe 2 st. and a beating she was so heavily backed for the Derby that on the day of the race she was at one time a better favourite than Favonius. However, Mr. Chaplin's filly finished nowhere, the fact being that the trial was moonshine, as, not only could Hannah have given Steppe 2 st., but Favonius was himself a stone superior to the One Thousand winner. It is worse than useless to try for such a race as the Derby with rubbish, for a gallop of this description is only misleading. Wool Winder is a very good-looking colt, and his action has greatly improved during the last few weeks, being now much better balanced. Colonel Baird's horse gallops as if he would find no more difficulty in coming down the hill at Epsom than will Slieve Gallion. Wool Winder has two nice engagements at Ascot if he misses the Derby, the New Biennial (Old Mile) on Thursday, and the Triennial (Hunt Cup course) on Friday. My opinion of the Derby is that Slieve Gallion will win, and that Wool Winder may finish second.

A morning paper printed on Saturday some sensational rubbish about an alleged "great trial of Galvani for the Derby." A person who witnessed this "great trial" informs me that "only an idiot" would describe it thus. The colt was merely sent for an ordinary exercise gallop of one mile and a half on the Limekilns. The pace was slow for the first part of the gallop, which exactly suited Galvani, who was accompanied by Hammerkop, Baltinglass, and the Irish horse Armagh. If this was "far and away the best gallop" which the reporter has seen this year, he cannot have witnessed the sharp work of Bezonian and Wool Winder. The fact is that these two colts have both done a great deal more work, and very much better work, than Galvani, who has never yet been sent one mile and a half at racing speed from start to finish.

The admirers of Major Loder's colt were never wearied in the winter of discoursing on his defeat of Slieve Gallion, although Captain Greer's colt was well known to have been much below the mark when he ran for the Middle Park Plate. One heard nothing about Galvani's subsequent defeat by Polar Star in the Criterion Stakes. It seems to me, however, that the race which exposes the pretensions of Galvani to be regarded as a veritable flyer, when judged by his two-year-old running, is the Imperial Produce Plate at Kempton Park, which was run a week before the Middle Park Plate, when he was in his best form. Galvani then met Olympian at even weights, and only just won by a length and a half. It was maintained by many good judges who watched the finish that Olympian was unlucky not to win, and Lord Derby's colt was certainly no flyer, nor is he ever likely to be regarded as such.

It was a sign of great weakness when Galvani was withdrawn from his engagement at Hurst Park, which was a certainty for him if he really has any pretensions to Derby form. The chance of Baltinglass, who represented Major Loder, was apparently regarded as hopeless, for he was not backed for a penny piece. The poor class of the field was demonstrated by the fact that Billidere started favourite, and he gave Baltinglass 7 lb. and a neck beating. Freeborn, who was a Newmarket tip for this race, cannot stay beyond six furlongs. Olympus was supposed to be the best thing of the day, and Lord Rosebery's colt was heavily backed for the two-year-old race, but the swerving of Nile Green at the most critical point in the race settled his chance, and the utterly unfancied Damage won by a neck.

I hear that M. Aumont's three-year-old, Calomel II., will be sent to England to run for the Ascot Cup. Calomel II. has been doing very well in France lately, and last Thursday he won the Prix des Acacias at Longchamps. This colt is engaged in the Grand Prix, but his owner will probably be represented in that race by Pernod.

Sir Ernest Cochrane's filly, St. Griselda, half-sister, by St. Gris, to Falconet, is very smart, and her success in the Loder Plate at Phœnix Park was a most creditable performance, as there was a field of seventeen behind her. She was bred by Miss Knox Gore, but passed into the possession of Mr. C. M. Prior, who sold her to her present owner. I hear that St. Griselda is to run at Kempton Park next week for the Redfern Plate of £800, and she has a breeding allowance of 7 lb. in that race. It will be an interesting race if St. Griselda and Llangwm (10 lb. allowed) both start, and I should expect the colt to win.

Traquair was regarded as a certainty for the Hurst Park Yearling Plate, and there was plunging accordingly on Lord Rosebery's colt, but he is now a very bad roarer, and he cannot get six furlongs. Portland Boy, a good-looking and powerful colt, won all the way. He is probably uncertain in his running, as his sire certainly was.

The only event of general interest on the first day at Manchester was the Red Rose Stakes, for which All Black was considered to be a really good thing, and odds were recklessly betted on him, but he hopelessly failed to stay the course, and Jubilee won cleverly, and apparently she started unbacked. I warned the admirers of All Black months ago against the insanity of backing an animal, which had never won a race, for the Derby at the ridiculous odds which were then being accepted by some infatuated simpletons. All the money which then went on this colt is obviously lost.

The Duke of Devonshire won the John o' Gaunt Plate with Cheshire Cat, who is one of the smartest two-year-olds that has been out this season so far, and a great credit to her sire, Tarporley. It was the opinion of the late Duke of Westminster that this horse would have won the Derby if he had gone on all right. Cheshire Cat will run for the Fernhill Stakes at Ascot.

Beppo won the Manchester Cup with extreme ease, and Mr. de Rothschild's horse started favourite. Killeagh, who was the great fancy at Newmarket, might possibly have been successful if the winner had been absent. Beppo palpably had the race in hand some distance from home. Noctuiform ran well, and this horse will win a race before long.

When I was invited to send a representative to the formal opening of the new Edgware Golf Club's course at Canons Park, ten minutes from Edgware Station, I determined to do so, and for this reason: The course was not described as being the best, or one of the best, inland courses in the kingdom. This was a marked peculiarity demanding special investigation. Wherefore I sent a young and enthusiastic golfer to prospect. He has played over many courses, and I felt I could rely on him. After luncheon he played round, and, fortunately for the club, he was on the top of his game. He is therefore wildly enthusiastic. Had he been off his game, I should have known precisely how much allowance to make for natural depression. The course is 5,700 yards long. The short holes are very good indeed, one of them being one of the best cleek shots that my young friend has seen inland. I ascertained that he played a lovely shot at this hole. The general proposition, however, is accurate, and the long holes are really admirably planned. The course was laid out by Willie Park. It is on clay, with strips of gravel. Over £2,000 has been spent on drainage, and the course was in good condition last Thursday, when, as I may remind golfers, the majority of cricket matches were off owing to the effects of rain. It may safely be said that it is not a dry season's course. It will be good in winter time and wet weather. There are about 120 acres of land, and there is plenty of room for a ladies' course. At present all play over the same greens, and so the suffragettes are not likely to attack the place. This shows prudence on the part of the management, as the distance from the Marble Arch will be materially diminished in a few months, when the Cricklewood trams will run to the club gates. There are a good many trees on the estate, but the course has been laid out with a view to avoiding them. There are two or three that obviously ought to come down. The present members have been playing over the course since January. I am informed that the view from the clubhouse windows is unequalled amongst London clubs. When my young friend is as experienced a journalist as he is a golfer, he will understand that his expression is, in the words of the old pleader, bad for ambiguity. I must thank both the secretary and the members for giving him what he describes as one of the jolliest days' golfing he has ever had. He is quite anxious to become a journalist.

From time to time horrible accusations are made against me. A gentleman cricketer says I am facetious about amateur cricketers. He says they call themselves gentlemen, not amateurs, and have as much right to make money by cricket as their social inferiors. He adds: "If you think gentlemen are to pay for the game whilst cads make money out of it you are mistaken." I can assure him that I think nothing of the sort. The only cads who make money out of it are so-called gentlemen cricketers, who come out of one gate at the pavilion when they are being paid just as much money, if not more, than the player who comes out of the other gate and has not "Mr." on the scoring card before his name. My correspondent is fortunately anonymous. He does not say he has ever played for the county. I hope he never will. There are just as good fellows among the gentlemen as among the professionals. In many cases it would be indelicate to inquire as to the merits or the occupations of their sires. My position is very simple. So long as a man is paid, directly or indirectly, for playing he should go out of the same gate as the other players. The Yorkshire team all go out together. The gentleman is primâ facie an amateur. He is not paid for playing. If he is paid he should not play for the Gentlemen against the Players.

This eternal amateur question is for ever raising trouble. I have always said that what may be a good definition in one branch of sport may be useless for another sport. The whole question was raised with regard to rowing at a meeting of the Polytechnic rowing men last week at their headquarters at Regent-street, under the presidency of Mr. J. C. K. Studd. There is a Polytechnic Rowing Association, some of whose members are qualified to row under the peculiar definition of the Amateur Rowing Association, and some who are not. The A.R.A. excludes any one who has ever been engaged in manual labour for money or wages, or who is or has been by trade or employment for wages a mechanic, artisan, or labourer, or engaged in any menial duty. The Polytechnic naturally contains men engaged in all occupations, and those qualified under A.R.A. rules represented their club with credit in many of the Thames regattas. The A.R.A. rules did not prevent them. The A.R.A. was satisfied so long as this definition was complied with by the competitors. But then a movement was organised whereby the committees of the different river regattas were induced to refuse the entries of any clubs not affiliated to the A.R.A. The effect was twofold. It prevented men with houses on the river organising during the summer months fours or eights to row for private clubs like Fieldhead, Orkney Cottage, or the Vikings. Such clubs were valuable rowing nurseries. They kept the standard high. In fact, too high for a certain metropolitan club that shall be nameless. It also excluded the Polytechnic Rowing Association, as the members were of all classes. Thus the Polytechnic crew found themselves barred. Whether the boycott was aimed at them I do not propose to inquire. That the barring clause was undesirable in the general interests of rowing I am absolutely certain. However, the Polytechnic men have resolved to form a separate organisation of oarsmen qualified under the illogical rule of the A.R.A. This club will seek, and will, I hope, receive recognition.

But surely the time has arrived when the A.R.A. may well consider the class definition that has been adopted. It quite fails to effect anything rational. The grocer's assistant and the telegraph boy are eligible, but the highly trained head gardener or skilled chauffeur is disqualified. Let the test be affiliation to the A.R.A., and let the barring clause stop at the class or trade definition. An A.R.A. sub-committee consisting of representatives of the highest class clubs should be formed, and this body should decide whether a club is fit to belong to the Association. If a club misconducts itself, then it should be liable to summary dismissal. I would not let affiliated clubs necessarily have votes. For I firmly believe that the high tone of amateur oarsmanship is due to the fact that it is to so great an extent controlled by the old oarsmen of Oxford and Cambridge, Leander, Thames, and London.

With regard to the Leander eight, Bucknall, the Oxford president, will be the eighth man. He will row bow. The club will also put on a four, in which I am sorry that a place has not been found for Mr. Guy Nickalls. There was some talk of his rowing for Magdalen. But as that College has lost its place at head of the river, being bumped by Christ Church, who have gone up steadily for several years under Mr. Fletcher's coaching, I presume that Nickalls' old college will not go for the Grand. I hear that he will row in the London four. Jesus are said to be certain to go head at Cambridge. The Hall boat has fallen off, and is not doing as well as was expected. Third are not strong, but they have improved under Johnstone's stroking.

Having regard to the wickets that they have had to play on, I rather fancy that the South African cricketers have astonished those who regarded them as being scarcely first class. That their bowling is good is shown by the scores of Leicester and Essex. Their batting shows no sign of a tail, but some of the men show a tendency to poke at the offside ball, which is fatal with good slips. Surrey and Kent have tasted the bitterness of defeat at the hands of Notts and Lancashire. Surrey played a great uphill game, and Lees had bad luck in bowling. Notts cricket is now quite bright and merry. Kent made a fine struggle, losing by only six runs. Kent and Notts do not meet. It is a pity. Surely bygones might be bygones.

Dismal Stock Markets—Not a Bright Spot Anywhere—"Bears" the Only Buyers—Dearer Money—The Rand Strike—Liquidation in Connection with a Large Deceased Estate.

THE recovery in the Stock Markets is a thing always to be, but never is. When members departed for their holidays some of them faintly expressed a hope that "after Whitsun" the tide was to turn, but Whitsun has been left well behind, and markets are still wallowing. Indeed, throughout the length and breadth of the Stock Exchange last week there was not one bright spot, and in the majority of cases the fall in values, which was fostered at the outset by a fresh downward plunge in American Rails, assumed substantial dimensions. Public support was a dead letter, the only buying apparently coming from the "bears," whenever those operators thought the time had come to secure profits. On the top of this has come the failure, just at the start of the settlement, of the old-established firm of jobbers, Messrs. Hubert Brunton and Co. The announcement of the default was unexpected, and fears of further trouble have naturally arisen, and these are not likely to be dispelled until the settlement is right out of the way. The failure was mainly the result of commitments in copper and South African shares. I have more than once lately dealt with what I believe to be the main causes affecting the Stock Markets within recent months, and will now merely mention one or two additional factors that came into operation last week. The first was a fairly marked rise in money rates, the movement here being partly a response to the hardening process going on at the two chief Continental centres, and partly the outcome of a transfer of funds from Lombard-street to the Bank of England. The French exchange has moved against London to an extent that has revived an active inquiry for gold on Paris account, and, with the Bank still in a comparatively lean state (the Reserve, according to last week's return, being only a little over 24½ millions), talk about an early reduction in the Bank rate has become less confident. Then there has been the disturbance produced by the strike of white miners on the Rand, a matter which, while, of course, directly influencing the Kaffir market, has aroused some misgivings over the question of gold exports from South Africa. Now, I have no wish to minimise the importance of the gold output from our chief source of supply in its relation to the Money and Stock Markets, for a curtailment of gold production in the present phenomenally active state of the world's trade would be fraught with the most far-reaching consequences, but it seems to me that the present strike need not be taken too seriously. With the mine owners on their part determined to adhere to their claim, which is simply a fair day's work for a fair—I might almost say generous—day's pay, and with the men on their part lacking a war chest in the shape of union funds, the dispute can surely have only one end, and that probably before many weeks are over. However, it is the fashion in the City just now to apply a double magnifying glass to every conceivable "bear" point, and to look at "bull" points through the wrong end of the telescope.

Another main influence upon prices last week was some heavy liquidation, arising, so it was reported, from the realisation of a large deceased estate. The deceased capitalist referred to was a millionaire who had a known partiality for South American Railway stocks, and the fact that this section of the Stock Exchange was particularly depressed gives colour to the story. Naturally, with no buyers about, the offer of large lines of stock had an undue effect upon values. It is advisable to give prominence to this incident, as it may serve to reassure holders who may have been frightened into believing something had occurred to change the outlook for the lines in which they are interested. As a matter of fact, the South American Railway group, and particularly the Argentine and Brazilian section, contains some of the best bargains that are at present to be found in the Stock Exchange, and, rather than sell what they have, investors might with advantage add to their holdings. Among Government securities Consols still set a bad lead, and the price at the end of the week fell to 84⅝, which was really 84, after allowing for the fact that a quarter's interest will be deducted from the price at the June Settlement. Seeing that even now they do not return quite 3 per cent., it is difficult to call Goschen's cheap, having regard to the big disparity in the yield that exists between this stock and other high-class investment securities, and until money gets still easier and the Sinking Fund has had time to make its influence felt, it is apparently useless to expect any real recovery in the funds. The matter has lately had a depressing effect upon Bank shares, for the joint-stock banks which a few years ago wrote their holdings of Consols down to 85 will probably at the next half-yearly make-up of accounts find it necessary to allow for further depreciation. International stocks have been dull during the week, but declines have been comparatively small, even Russian bonds failing to go back far, despite the renewal of political outbreaks among the populace. The issues of the Peruvian Corporation were inclined to harden on the report—which I believe has good foundation—that a settlement with the Government has been arranged, and that only a few minor details have now to be agreed upon in order to round off the negotiations.

Home Rails Demoralised—The Bears in Possession Aided by Forced Liquidation—Traffics Considered—The Brighton's Unfortunate Position—Rumours of Fresh Capital Officially Denied—Some Attractive Yields.

For the greater part of last week the Home Railway Market was simply a target for the "bears." Public support from this department appeared to be almost entirely withdrawn, and prices fell without a show of resistance. Judging from the fact that there were very few sales of odd lots of stock, real holders were not throwing out their securities, though what appeared to be liquidation in connection with a large deceased estate served to give values a fresh cold douche towards the end of the week. If only the "bears" could be tempted to really take liberties it would be the best thing that could happen for the Railway Market, as the knowledge that a short account existed might easily constitute a spur with which to inaugurate a revival. But with speculation in Rails almost a dead letter operators for the fall are afraid to punt out of sight of land. So the market continues to drift, the monotonous tale of decline being varied only by a temporary flicker of recovery now and again, when members of the ursine fraternity choose to cover. In the early part of the week an excuse for depressing prices was found in the traffic returns for the pre-Whitsun period, the passenger lines having naturally suffered from the effects of the cold weather, which was reminiscent of Christmas more than the merry month. However, something towards restoring the balance was provided by the receipts published later by the heavy lines. The full results may be gathered from the following table, which gives the "estimated" figures for both periods:—

The market was specially impressed by the Great Western increase, which had the additional merit of coming on top of a £13,000 gain a year ago. It may be conceded that the performance as a whole fell considerably short of what might have been had the Clerk of the Weather been kinder—and that no better results are to be looked for in respect of the Bank Holiday week—but if the market wishes to seriously study traffics it need not worry too much about the figures for one or two weeks, but should keep its eye upon the aggregate showings. These are set out below:—

Excluding the Brighton and the purely Metropolitan lines—which latter, with the exception of the City and South London, continue to suffer from competition amongst themselves and from other forms of traction—there is solid ground for satisfaction in a perusal of the above results. The Brighton has certainly been roughly handled of late, what with the competition set up by the London County Council's electric tramways and by the increased use of the motor-car and 'bus. For twenty weeks it has lost in gross receipts £29,500, so that if the same rate of shrinkage be shown for the rest of the year, the total falling off for the twelve months would be over £76,000. As expenses are bound to rule high during the current year, it is difficult to see how a serious cut in the dividend on Berthas can be avoided. The best that can be hoped is that the company will be able to make up some leeway during the summer months, and that its latest departure in the direction of cultivating the long-distance season ticket holder by the offer of more attractive rates will provide some compensation for the diversion of short-distance traffic. In any case the position is bad enough, without the manufacture of false rumours, such as that which credited the board with contemplating an issue of £1,000,000 capital. As a matter of fact, the company has no intention of adding to its capital either this year or next. The market has already made pretty liberal allowance for the change in the Brighton Company's fortunes, for the quotation of 85¾ touched last Thursday represents a fall of 36 points since the beginning of the year, while it is within 7 points of the lowest figure touched during the last twenty-five years.

Reverting to the traffics of the heavy lines, such as the Great Western, North-Western, Midland, North-Eastern, and Leeds, the figures are sufficiently large to make holders easy in their minds about the forthcoming dividends. It should be possible, at least in the case of the Brum and Berwick, to pay increased dividends, after making liberal allowance for the increase in the cost of coal and other materials, but even assuming that the dividends be merely maintained, and that advantage be taken of revenue surpluses to increase reserve funds, the yields on the leading stocks, based upon last year's distributions, are by no means unattractive. For instance, Great Westerns and Leeds give 4½ per cent., while Brums and Berwicks return about 1-16 per cent. more. Then there are my two low-priced favourites, York deferred and Hulls, which are so exceptionally placed in the matter of earnings and dividend prospects that a present purchaser might count upon a yield of from 5 to 5½ per cent. in respect of the current year. In the Underground group, City and South London seems the pick of the bunch, for the yield on the basis of last year's dividend is over 5 per cent., and the line is only just beginning to show the beneficial results of the Euston extension. My usual table of prices follows:—

Continued "Bear" Carnival in Yankees—The Rise in Wheat—The Government and the Railroads—Declining Net Earnings—The Continued Output of New Issues.

The American Market seldom does things by halves, and since the "bears" assumed command of the situation at the beginning of the year they may lay claim to a run of brilliant success. Their triumphal career was continued throughout the greater part of last week, when the market was under the harrow of bad crop reports—which encouraged furious speculation for the rise in wheat—and further new issues. The report by Mr. H. K. Smith, Commissioner of Corporations, submitted to President Roosevelt upon the Standard Oil Company was another adverse factor, as it gave a fresh reminder of the hostility that exists between the Government and certain leading members of the capitalist class. According to the covering letter sent with his report, Mr. Smith maintained that "the history and present operations of the Standard Oil Company's interests shows throughout the past five years a substantial monopolisation of the petroleum industry of the country, the deliberate destruction of competition and the consequent control of that industry by less than a dozen men who have reaped enormous profits therefrom. The Standard Oil Company's commercial efficiency, while of the greatest, has been consistently directed, not at reducing prices to the public and thus maintaining its predominant position through superior service, but rather at crippling existing rivals and preventing the rise of others by vexatious and oppressive attacks on them, and securing for itself the most unfair and wide-reaching discrimination in transport facilities and rates, both as regards railroads and pipe lines, while standing in the way as far as possible of such facilities for all competitors." That the Government is laying itself out to deal deliberately with removing some of the worst evils that have grown up with the development of the Trust principle there can be no doubt, and the knowledge naturally helps to keep Wall Street in a state of unrest. So far as the railroads are concerned, we are not unlikely to witness some big enforced shiftings of stock within the next few years; the Union Pacific combination, we know, is now under the consideration of the authorities, and rumour says the Hill group is shortly to be made the subject of a searching inquiry.

At the same time, this is not a matter which need of itself unduly perturb the holder of American Railroad securities. In a speech made a week ago by Mr. C. A. Prouty, Chairman of the Inter-State Commerce Commission—which was accepted as having been inspired by President Roosevelt—emphasis was once more laid upon the fact that the Government has no intention to disturb vested rights in associated capital. Mr. Prouty, in venturing upon an explanation of the cause of the present lack of public confidence in railroad stocks, said:

> It is not the feeling of apprehension that the Government will confiscate the railroads which prevents the public from making such investments, but rather the uncertainty as to the future of those stocks. When once it becomes certain, however, that no railroad stock or bond can be issued without the consent of the Government, and, further, that every dollar derived from their sale shall be legitimately invested in the property, and when no inter-State railroad can buy a dollar's worth of stock in any other railroad company without the consent of the Government, then will railroad securities assume their proper place in public confidence.

These remarks are in a sense reassuring to railroad stockholders, though the fact that the Government means to curb the power of some of the magnates goes far to explain why Wall-street at present gives no sign of inaugurating a revival in stocks, because hitherto the lead in any "bull" campaign has always come from the small ring of New York capitalists whose financial policy is now challenged. Meanwhile, too, the declining tendency of railroad net earnings, the seriousness of which has been further threatened by the damage in the wheat belt, and the continuance of the stream of new issues remain a problem for the market, and make authorities hesitate to assert that the prices have yet gravelled, admittedly very low though they in most cases are. A good idea of the shrinkage in values may be obtained from the following table:—

THE FALL OF NAPOLEON.

"The Fall of Napoleon." By Oscar Browning. With Numerous Illustrations. (Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

What strikes one most in Mr. Oscar Browning's admirable monograph on "The Fall of Napoleon," especially in its earlier chapters, is the blind-man's-buff character of a campaign in those days as compared with the relatively chess-board clearness of the great game of war to-day. Again and again you find, not the history of the campaign only, but the very history of Europe, turn upon the blank ignorance of a general of the whereabouts of the enemy, then perhaps within a few miles of him. Before his first abdication, e.g., Napoleon for days together was ignorant that the allies with an army 200,000 strong were marching on Paris, and fancied that he was engaged with the army of Schwarzenberg when he was fighting the forces of Blücher. Before his final abdication, he so miscalculated the movements of Blücher after his rout of him at Ligny as to lose Waterloo. Indeed, Waterloo would not have been lost but for the misreading by two of Napoleon's generals of ill-written pencil messages. During the battle of Ligny Soult sent Ney the following peremptory command:—

> The Emperor charges me to tell you that you must manœuvre immediately so as to envelop the right of the enemy and to fall upon his rear. This army is lost if you act vigorously. The fate of France is in your hands, so do not hesitate to make the movement which the Emperor orders, and march on the heights of St. Amand and Brye.

But this order, written badly in pencil, D'Erlon, who had 20,000 men at his disposal, misread by mistaking "sur la hauteur de Saint Armand" for "à la hauteur de Saint Amand," with the result that the Prussians escaped annihilation. Again, when the Prussians were thus enabled to come up at the crisis of the battle of Waterloo, Soult sent the dilatory Grouchy this peremptory but ill-written and pencilled despatch:—

> At this moment the battle is engaged on the line of Waterloo in front of the forest of Soignes. We think we see Bülow on the heights of St. Lambert. Do not lose a moment in coming to us and crushing Bülow.

Grouchy misread "la bataille est engagée" for "la bataille est gagnée"! Even as it was, Waterloo, as Wellington again and again expressed it on the day after the battle to Creevey, "was a near thing." "It has been a d——d nice thing; the nearest-run thing you ever saw in your life." "He repeated so often," adds Creevey, "it's being so nice a thing, so nearly run a thing," that I asked him if the French at Waterloo had fought better than he had ever seen them do before. "No," he said, "they have always fought the same ever since I first saw them at Vimeira." Then he said, "By God! I don't think it would have done, if I had not been there." Waterloo was a soldier's victory won by the bull-dog doggedness of the English, which astonished even Wellington, as you find in the same page of "The Creevey Papers," and which drew from Napoleon himself this despairing comment: "It has always been the same since Crecy." Perhaps the most striking incident in all the romance of war is that of Napoleon's facing alone in the defile at Laffray the battalion of infantry drawn up to shoot him down when he appeared on that wonderful march to Paris after his escape from Elba. Delessart, who was in command, resolved to do, and to compel the regiment to do, this dread duty. Napoleon having ordered the soldiers under his own command to carry their muskets under their left arms, advanced towards the hostile battalion. Upon his appearance Captain Randon cried, "There he is! Fire!" The soldiers were livid, their limbs shook, and their hands trembled. Napoleon, now advanced within pistol-shot, cried, "Soldiers of the Fifth Regiment, recognise me!" Advancing nearer yet and throwing open his overcoat, he challenged them thus: "If there is amongst you a soldier who wishes to kill his Emperor, he can do it. Here I am!" A great shout arose of "Vive l'Empereur!" The ranks were broken, the white cockades of the Bourbons strewed the ground; shakos were elevated at the point of the bayonet, the soldiers rushed to their Emperor, surrounded him, cheered him, knelt down before him, stroked his boots, his sword, and the hem of his garment. It was impossible so to write any part of the life of such a man as to make it uninteresting; but Mr. Oscar Browning has made, not the least, but the most of the romantic material at his command for the story of the fall of the greatest figure in history.

RECOLLECTIONS OF DIZZY.

"Lord Beaconsfield and Other Tory Memories." By T. E. Kebbel. (Cassell. 16s. net.)

The late Lord Rowton was severely blamed during his life and after his death for his failure to write the long-expected "Biography of Lord Beaconsfield;" but this censure, it seems, was as unreasonable as the demand made upon the Israelites to make bricks without straw. After Lord Beaconsfield's death, Mr. Kebbel, as he tells us in his interesting "Lord Beaconsfield and Other Tory Memories," went down to Hughenden with Lord Rowton to search through the papers and letters left at his secretary's discretion by the statesman to make what use he pleased of them for a biography. But in boxful after boxful of such documents absolutely nothing was found of the slightest biographical interest or importance. It is possible that the "Asian Mystery" may have fully revealed itself to Lord Rowton in the confidences of close personal intimacy, but, judging from the little Mr. Kebbel has gleaned from a quarter of a century's acquaintance with Lord Beaconsfield—who once designated him as his future biographer—even Lord Rowton probably did not get behind the veil. Froude says that Disraeli had but two intimate friends—his wife and Mrs. Willyams—and it is from one of these two that we get the most characteristic glimpses of the man, as distinguished from the statesman. On the night of one of his greatest parliamentary triumphs, when he was pressed by enthusiastic admirers to celebrate his victory with them at the Carlton, he went home with his wife. "Dizzy," she said, triumphantly, to Mr. Kebbel, "came home with me. I had got him a raised pie from Fortnum and Mason's and a bottle of champagne, and he ate half the pie and drank all the champagne and said then, 'Why, my dear, you are more like a mistress than a wife!'" Nothing could be more characteristic of either than that her "Dizzy" should intend this, and that she herself should accept it, as a compliment. "You know," said "Dizzy" to her once in the presence of the Dean of Salisbury, who reported the story to Mr. Kebbel—"you know I married you for your money." "Oh, yes; but if you were to marry me again, you'd marry me for love, wouldn't you?" "Oh, yes." Indeed, in her very first interview with Mr. Kebbel this candid old lady "told me of her first acquaintance with 'Dizzy,' as she always called him, of the sums she had spent in electioneering down to that date—I think she said a hundred thousand pounds—and that she was well rewarded by the devotion of so brilliant a husband." Of Disraeli the statesman, Mr. Kebbel, as one of the journalists whom he inspired, naturally knew more, but as he used Mr.

Kebbel as his mouthpiece to proclaim urbi et orbi his political principles of the moment, we are not sure that we get any nearer the politician than a perusal of his speeches would bring us. At the same time, it is only fair to Mr. Kebbel to quote this testimonial from Lord Rowton to his special knowledge of Disraeli's character and principles:—

Dear Mr. Kebbel,—It is now nearly twenty years since my dear old friend, Lord Beaconsfield, told me to read something of yours as the work of one who "understood him," as there were not many such at that time.—Yours very truly, Rowton.

At all events, Mr. Kebbel is always interesting and often entertaining. It is odd, by the way, to find such an accomplished journalist using the phrase "mutual friend," and attributing Swift's "sweetness and light," to be found in "The Battle of the Books," to Matthew Arnold.

A NOVELIST'S VIEW OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

"The House of Defence." By E. F. Benson. (Heinemann. 6s.)

Mr. E. F. Benson's "The House of Defence" might, perhaps, be regarded as a counter-blast to Mark Twain's and Mr. T. P. O'Connor's merciless exposure of Mrs. Eddy; yet there is nothing irreconcilably conflicting between these exposures of the Apostle of Christian Science and the apparently miraculous cures to which Mr. Benson testifies and on which his fascinating novel is founded. Mr. Benson explains his dedication of the novel to "C. E. M." by the undoubted fact that this friend was cured by Christian Science of a disease which, though of nervous origin, had become organic. It was already organic when the patient consulted the famous doctor (figuring in the novel as "Sir James"), who despaired to effect the cure, wrought afterwards by Christian Science. But this apparent miracle was outdone by another which Mr. Benson saw performed himself. "C. E. M.," from being a Christian Science patient, became a Christian Science doctor, and in that capacity cured an inveterate laudanum drinker:—

"I hope," says Mr. Benson in this remarkable dedication, "I shall never forget that which with my own eyes I saw you do. To save that drug-logged wreck, who was our friend, when you saw no other way of convincing him of the beastliness of his habit, you drank that which, by all that is known of the drug, should have killed you, and you drank it with complete and absolute confidence that it could not possibly hurt you. It is true—at least Sir James tells me so—that it is not quite easy to poison oneself with laudanum, because the amateur will usually take too much and be sick, or too little, and thus not imbibe a fatal dose. But you drank a good deal, and it appeared to have no effect whatever on you. I will go farther: It had no effect whatever on you. But it had the effect you saw on your patient. It cured him."

Nevertheless, Mr. Benson no more believes in Mrs. Eddy than Mark Twain or Mr. T. P. O'Connor. He believes that as the mind acts on the body in bringing on illness of one kind or another, that it also may act on the body in healing illness of one kind or another—the disease, e.g., of drinking or drug-taking—since here it is the brain that is the seat of the trouble. But why did this mortal dose of laudanum have no effect whatever upon the Christian Science doctor? Is it because, as Christian Science teaches, there is neither healing nor hurt in material things? Not at all, answers Mr. Benson, it was because of "C. E. M.'s" absolute confidence that the drug could not hurt her—the body here obeying the order of the mind. Mr. Benson's explanation of the facts to which he testifies would not only explain miracles in the past, but would promise us miracles in the future. For this and other reasons "The House of Defence" will probably be the most widely-read and discussed novel of the season.

TALES OF MYSTERY AND ADVENTURE.

"The Diamond Ship." By Max Pemberton. (Cassell and Co. 6s.)
"The Secret of the Square." By William Le Queux. (F. V. White. 6s.)
"Captain Kirke Webbe." By F. W. Hayes. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
"The Quest of El Dorado." By Wilmot Waring. (Cassell and Co. 6s.)
"The Secret of the Moor Cottage." By H. Ripley Cromarsh. (Ward, Lock, and Co. 6s.)

A vivid imagination, a dexterous touch for characterisation, a disregard for superfluous detail, and a flowing pen—above all a flowing pen—are necessary to make the adventure novel a success. These are the qualities which have won success for Mr. Max Pemberton's previous novels, and which will undoubtedly make a success of "The Diamond Ship," the floating home of villainy, where the great criminals of the world find shelter under the protecting care of the repulsive Jew, Valentine Imroth. Imroth is a genuine Surreyside villain of the old sort, and so it is quite natural that Dr. Ean Fabos, who is the true hero of melodrama—gallant, impassive, determined—should, with the assistance of his faithful servant, the little Japanese Okyada, bring him to book. It is natural, also, that the incentive to his exertions should be all that is charming, sweet, and feminine, in two words—Joan Fortinbras. No one will desire to find fault with Mr. Pemberton's latest story, except the hardened realist and—well, Mr. Pemberton does not write for him.

Nor does Mr. Le Queux. Mr. Le Queux's mission is to amuse, and although he makes use of quite a different formula to Mr. Pemberton, he mixes his ingredients with so skilful a hand that he rarely fails of success. The ingredients of his last romance are simple. A stranger in a slouch hat, a young doctor, a fat man in a motor, a young married woman and a young unmarried ditto, and a quiet, sedate London square. One can imagine what Anthony Trollope would have done with these properties, but it would be nothing like the result Mr. Le Queux produces. Analysis of character is not Mr. Le Queux's forte. He scents a mystery in that sedate London square, and forthwith it encompasses all the characters and the reader, and does not allow any of them a moment's breathing space until it is solved in the last chapter. Evidently Mr. Le Queux possesses a flowing pen.

There is a smack of an older formula in Mr. Hayes's romance, for it takes one back to the good old times when the adventurous element to be found even amongst a nation of shop-keepers, instead of speculating on the Stock Exchange, put their savings into ships and guns, and speculated in the lives of men. A notable figure in such days was the redoubtable Captain Kirke Webbe, not perhaps the ideal patriot, but a very perfect pirate, for he engaged in his privateering with as much gusto under the French flag as under the English, and as le Capitaine Renaudin of L'Espiègle robbed the English with as much sangfroid as under his own name, and as commander of the Scout, he robbed the French. He is the central figure of Mr. Hayes's stirring story, which is full of the true romantic complications, and lacks not the essential happy ending.

There ought to be romance in a novel with a title like "The Quest of El Dorado," but, alas! the visions which are conjured up by the name which has lured so many adventurous souls to destruction are not given shape and substance in Mr. Waring's story. The El Dorado of which the author's puppets are in quest is a schoolgirl's vision, a vision of a bread-and-butter-fed imagination. The publishers announce that the name of the author, Wilmot Waring, is merely the nom de plume of a well-known writer, who desires to conquer the public afresh by a book on somewhat different lines to those he usually writes. If the new public he seeks to conquer inhabits the girls' schoolroom he will probably achieve his object, for Kathleen and Philip, Rosamund and Gavine, Uncle Tom and Uncle Mark, and Clifford Manton and all the rest of them are just the conventional people who live in girls' story books and never outside of them.

There is a strongly conventional flavour, too, about "The Secret of the Moor Cottage," and, again, the convention is an ancient one, almost as old, in fact, as Mr. Cromarsh's method of telling his story through the mouths of different actors in the drama. When two persons take possession of a retired country cottage, eschew local acquaintance, and give no hint as to their antecedents, they have, in fiction, always good reasons for concealing their identity. That is what happens to Mr. and Miss Clark in this volume, and the secret they conceal is well worth unearthing. But, unfortunately, Mr. Cromarsh does not succeed in exciting any particular interest in Mr. and Miss Clark. One feels that such very ordinary persons have no right to possess secrets at all.

"The Colour of London." By W. J. Loftie, F.S.A. Illustrated in colour after pictures by Yoshio Markino. With an introduction by M. H. Spielmann and an essay by the artist. (Chatto and Windus. 20s. net.)

Though Mr. Loftie's letterpress is very readable, the illustrations by a Japanese artist naturally constitute the chief attraction of this handsome colour-book. Mr. Spielmann tells us that the artist, Mr. Markino, has been here for ten years, finding in London an irresistible and inexhaustible charm and fascination. The London streets, the London atmosphere, the London colour, hold him entranced. He loves even the fogs. In his essay as well as in his drawings Mr. Markino expresses his admiration of the city. Once or twice, indeed, he does indulge in a little gentle criticism, not of London, but of Londoners. It saddens him to observe that some ladies—he is a great admirer of English ladies—"mis-contrast the colours of their dresses." "What a pity," he exclaims, "to spoil their own natural beauty by their dresses! If they cannot understand about colour, they should be in black and white, which suits everybody." Still more distressing are some of the hats that he sees on Sundays and Bank Holidays. They are very inartistic; "some look as if they had bound up half a dozen boiled lobsters and crabs." He would rather see the wearers in a tam-o'-shanter, "which is rather naughty, but very pretty indeed." December is his favourite month in London. Then "the volume of thick mist which covers the whole town mystifies everything in the most picturesque way." Mr. Markino's pictures range over many widely contrasted scenes and aspects of London life, but he has an evident preference for mist effects and night studies, and it is with these that he is most successful. His wonderfully fresh and clever work brings out vividly beautiful effects in "the colour of London" which will be a revelation even to those who imagine that they have a thorough appreciation of it. The plates have been superbly printed, and the volume is altogether one of unique charm and interest.

THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION.

"Russia and Reform." By Bernard Pares, M.A. (Constable and Co., Ltd. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Red Russia." By John Foster Fraser. With Forty-eight Full-page Plates from Photographs. (Cassell and Co. 6s.)

"A Year in Russia." By Maurice Baring. (Methuen and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

It is a pity that the vast amount of solid information, patiently acquired, carefully sifted, and impartially presented in Mr. Bernard Pares' "Russia and Reform" was not compacted more coherently. It is rather thrown together than arranged logically and artistically. On the other hand, I know no recent book upon Russia with anything approaching the amount of first-hand knowledge shown by Mr. Pares in this encyclopædic volume. There is no subject which can interest a student of the Russia of to-day which is not dealt with wisely in this volume—Church or State, Tsar or people, nobles or peasants, the officials, the revolutionaries, the Zemstvos, Councils, Dumas, law and its administration, literature and the press, etc, are described and accounted for historically and politically by a man who seems to have given his life on the spot to their study. What is the conclusion of this patient and impartial expert? It is that the Russian reactionaries and revolutionists—the one the product of the other—are weak alike in number and in capacity. In fact, it is reaction alone which keeps revolution alive. The Reformers, on the other hand, are incomparably stronger in ability, in prestige, in number, and in character than the extremists on either side of them, and their movement will become invincible when they dissociate it publicly and universally from the methods of terrorism.

With or without convulsions the Reform movement is certain, sooner or later, to have its legitimate results. Underneath the great main factors are slowly but surely changing, and Russia will eventually issue on the path of a renewed life, with loyalty to the past and with confidence in the future.

Mr. John Foster Fraser would be pronounced by Mr. Pares no doubt as "one of those untrained correspondents who have, by their exaggeration, almost killed public interest in this great country"; nevertheless, his ominously named "Red Russia" is absorbing reading. It is, no doubt, full of horrors, such as that of the tortures of young girls stripped naked in Arctic cold and jeered at by Russian officers, who warm them by applying their lighted cigarettes to the nipples of their breasts. Or such, again, as this description given him by an English lady of what she had herself seen in the streets of Moscow when the Cossacks were running amok:—

The Cossacks were at all the street corners and shot at anybody who tried to cross. There was an old man, and he was so nervous. He got on his knees and tried to crawl. I watched him from our window. Then he lay flat. He slowly lifted his head to see if the soldiers were looking. He was afraid, and crawled back. He rolled himself in the snow, so he would be white, and then, very, very slowly, lying on his face, he pulled himself across. It seemed an hour. Oh, I did thank God when that old man got across. I thought a friend of mine was killed, and I went out to seek him. In the snow I found a baby's arm cut in two; the little hand blue with frost, nearly a yard from the arm. I think the baby must have been on its mother's breast when a mounted soldier cut at her.

Mr. Foster Fraser, in fact, has the natural eye of a popular writer for sensational incidents and accidents, and those who love excitement of this kind and, indeed, of all kinds, will thoroughly enjoy "Red Russia."

"I make no pretence of invincible impartiality," says Mr. Maurice Baring in his most interesting "A Year in Russia," "only I have seen and heard enough of both sides to learn one thing—that the two parties who are now engaged in Russia are both right or both wrong. I will try to the best of my ability to stifle my own feelings, and, like a piece of blotting paper which absorbs red or black ink indiscriminately, try to reproduce as best I can fragments of what I absorb." "Quot homines, tot sententiæ." The truth is there are so many Russias—Eastern and Western Russia, mediæval and modern Russia, the Russia of the peasant, and the Russia of the artisan, to say nothing of the Russias that are not Russian, but Polish, Finnish, Georgian, Jewish, etc.—that we should expect unanimity upon one point only—the helplessness and hopelessness of the present forcible-feeble Government of the country. Of the Russians proper, Mr. Baring, who was brought into intimate contact with all ranks, classes, and professions, has formed an opinion which seems in conflict with such atrocities as are recorded in "Red Russia"—that they are the humanest of peoples. But a nation, no more than an individual, ought not to be judged by moments of madness. In another chapter Mr. Baring describes an interview in the train with the gentlest, humblest, mildest-looking old man he had ever seen, and "who seemed an apostle in disguise." He was attracted towards him not by his appearance only, but also "by the extraordinary courtesy with which he prevented a woman with many bundles being turned out of the train by another moujik." "What are you?" asked Mr. Baring. "A convict." "What crime did you commit?" "Murder!" he answered, very gently. But on investigation it turned out to be a murder committed in the madness of intoxication. When very drunk he had set fire to a barn, and, upon the owner interfering, he had killed him. This old man seems to personate Russia in Mr. Baring's experience of her—ferocious only in moods and moments of intoxication. For the rest, "A Year in Russia" is the most impartial and one of the most suggestive books on that country in the present crisis that I have read, while it is as dramatic as it is impartial and suggestive. It is, so to say, a literary biograph of the scenes of the Russian Revolution, accompanied and explained by dramatic interviews with its leaders.

SOME NOTABLE STORIES.

"From One Man's Hand to Another." By G. H. Breda. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

"John Glynn." By Arthur Paterson. (Macmillan and Co.. 6s.)

"Sweet Rogues." By Owen Vaughan. (Owen Rhoscomyl.) (Duckworth and Co. 6s.)

"The Prince's Valet." By John Barnett. (Smith, Elder, and Co. 6s.)

"Windover Tales." By Halliwell Sutcliffe. (Smith, Elder, and Co. 6s.)

"The Glen o' Weeping." By Marjorie Bowen. (Alston Rivers, Ltd. 6s.)

"Our Lady of the Beeches." By the Baroness von Hutten. With Portrait by William Nicholson. (William Heinemann. 4s.)

"Dead Love has Chains." By M. E. Braddon. (Hurst and Blackett. 6s.)
"Nathan Todd." By Lucas Cleeve. (Digby, Long, and Co. 6s.)
"The Millionaire and the Lady." By Gertrude Warden. (John Long. 6s.)

"From One Man's Hand to Another," the latest issue of Mr. Fisher Unwin's "First Novel Library," makes an unfortunate start in Ireland, a country of which the writer knows so little that she speaks of the birth of an illegitimate child there "as common enough in a village where, like most other villages, no man concerned himself too closely about his neighbour's father." The author, however, is more at home when she gets to Vivian's London studio, where the boy hero falls in love with the presiding goddess, a woman twice his age, without beauty, grace, or character. "A lined and sallow face, a face that had no longer anything of youth in it. Or grace, or beauty." The staccato punctuation here is characteristic of a straining after effect noticeable in the novel itself. But it is unquestionably a clever novel, and, as a first attempt, of much promise.

Perhaps some of the characters and incidents of "John Glynn" are a little stagey, and of the Adelphi stage type at that; but it has the qualities of its defects, being a stirring story of the roughs of the East End of London, which goes with a gallop from the first page to the last. Its hero, John Glynn, "a man made in equal parts of indiarubber and steel," returning from the wild west of America, where he had made his pile as a cattle raiser and rancher, throws himself into the work of the regeneration of Relton, the most criminal hole in London. He and his chum, who had once saved him from being roasted alive by the Indians, are in love with the same heroine, a lady who also seems "to be made in equal parts of indiarubber and steel." She is the secretary of the movement for the relief and regeneration of Relton, and John and his chum fight many a battle for her and her cause. Indeed, John has a regular prize-ring fight without gloves with "the eighty-one-tonner," the champion of the desperadoes of the region—a battle Homerically described—in which he chivalrously ceded the victory to the man he had beaten: With a yet more generous chivalry he would have resigned the heroine to his chum, if the lady had not intervened to dispose of herself, and all ends as the reader would have it.

Wit and humour, thrilling adventures, hairbreadth escapes, two of the most charming of heroines, and two of the most gallant of heroes make Mr. Owen Vaughan's "Sweet Rogues" as enjoyable a novel as one would wish to read. "Sweetest nut hath sourest rind," and the two "sweet rogues" of the novel play the saucy part of Beatrice to their sorely-tried swains to perfection; but, when they do yield at last, it is with an enchanting grace. As for the adventures of the heroes, ducked now in cesspools, and anon threatened with being boiled alive in seething pitch, they keep you amused or enthralled throughout. The time of the story is that of the Cavaliers and Roundheads, and its heroes are in the immediate service of Prince Rupert, but it is with such an episode of the Civil War as no history records—the theft of a Roundhead dispatch—that we have chiefly to do. In a word, Mr. Owen Vaughan (Owen Rhoscomyl) has answered in "Sweet Rogues" the high expectation excited by his "Old Fireproof."

Perhaps the Prince is too much of a hero to his valet in Mr. John Barnett's "The Prince's Valet," but if we could forget the real character of Bonnie Prince Charlie—and the author does much to make you forget it—we should find all the romantic adventures of which he is made the chivalrous hero sufficiently exciting. Not the least interesting of these adventures is that where Bonnie Prince Charlie, en route to seek from Frederick the Great his sister and his help for the recovery of the throne, rescues this very sister from a band of desperate lepers who threatened her with contagion!

Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe, in his "Windover Tales," does not produce his good wine at the beginning of the feast, for certainly the weakest story in the collection is the first. The strongest is, perhaps, "From the Heart of the Storm," where the moving bog buries alive in the Black House Rolf Norland, in spite of all the efforts of his worst enemies to save him. Then there is "The Sexton's Tale," of a man whose second sight made him free of the company of ghosts; and "A Midnight Bridal," the strangest of impromptu wooings and weddings; and "Dick of the Road," where a coachman plays the rôle of Tennyson's "Lord Burleigh," all admirable, and told in a style that suits each as an accompaniment suits a song.

Miss Marjorie Bowen, in her preface to "The Glen o' Weeping" seems to echo Walpole's "Anything but history, for history must be false," but especially false is the story of "the massacre of Glencoe." "It was a military execution performed on rebels who were outside the law; its details neither so horrible nor so revolting as those of the numberless crimes committed by the victims themselves, and every other clan in Scotland." This Miss Bowen undertakes to suggest in "The Glen o' Weeping," and whether she has or has not succeeded in reversing the verdict of history, she has certainly succeeded in stringing together a succession of exciting episodes.

The Baroness von Hutten's "Our Lady of the Beeches" is written half in letters and half in narrative, and the letters prepare their writers to fall in love, while the narrative relates the unsatisfactory result. Perhaps the letters hardly prepare you for the sudden, intense, if restrained, love scenes, though they are sufficiently pessimistic to forewarn you of the moral of the meeting:—

La vie est brève;
Un peu d'espoir,
Un peu de rêve,
Et puis—bonsoir!

Miss Braddon's sad story, "Dead Love has Chains," shows that the right hand of that veteran novelist is far indeed from having lost its cunning. For my own part, I should have liked a more cheerful theme than that of the miseries of a girl unfortunate at once in her father and in her lover, and through both in her life; but of the power and pathos of the novel there is no doubt.

Lucas Cleeve ranges the whole world over in search of subjects to add to her gallery of portraits of character, and when she finds a fresh one she draws her picture with the sureness of touch which characterises the perfect artist. "Nathan Todd" is the latest of them. Nathan is the product of old ideas and new environment, the offspring of quiet people subservient to laws, to constitutionalism, and with the shadow of a thousand puritanisms upon him. Only America could have produced Nathan, and perhaps only Lucas Cleeve could have presented so delicately limned a picture of his heart searchings and mental struggles in the days of his early manhood. Lucas Cleeve does not take the reader further than the close of his first romance, but she makes the story of that romance of exceeding interest.

The millionaire of "The Millionaire and the Lady," is an outrageous cad, and "the lady" is a cat of the most feline type. But though these two persons give their names to Miss Gertrude Warden's latest novel, neither of them is the principal character. That part is reserved for Hero Marshall, whose career is described with great sympathy and no little skill from the day when she embarks upon a stage career in the hope of making a living for herself and her unpractical father, through the period of her married life with the despicable millionaire, until she comes into her own inheritance of real affection. Miss Warden's latest novel, if it does not add to, will not detract from, her reputation.

THE ALLIANCE WITH JAPAN.

"The Unveiled East." By F. A. Mackenzie. With illustrations and maps. (Hutchinson and Co. 12s. net.)

In this instructive volume Mr. Mackenzie says many things which will come as a shock to people who take the popular view of our alliance with Japan. He points out that Japan now occupies the position and pursues the policy which four years ago it was feared would be Russia's. While proclaiming her adherence to the doctrine of the "open door," Japan has in Korea and Manchuria adopted a policy of national preference and exclusive privilege; while nominally standing for the integrity of China, she is maturing plans "that can have no purpose if they do not involve the passing of large parts of Chinese territory into Japanese hands." Japan does not threaten India from the north by the advance of armies, "but her teachers are stirring up unrest among some of the Indian peoples, and her official agents have for nearly two years been at work on a great trade campaign there directly aimed at Lancashire's most profitable market." In these and other directions, too, abundant reasons can be discovered in support of Mr. Mackenzie's prediction that the imperial and commercial policy of Japan must inevitably, if maintained, strain the present alliance to breaking point within a generation. Though valuable in that respect, Mr. Mackenzie's book is not simply a survey of the political situation in the Far East. It is indeed largely composed of personal experiences and observations there, which make it fascinating reading even for those who take no serious interest in the political and commercial questions with which the author deals.

A PASSIONATE WOMAN AND SOME OTHERS.

"Which Woman?" by G. B. Burgin. (Nash. 6s.)
"The Invader." By Margaret L. Woods. (Heinemann. 6s.)
"London Lovers." By Margaret Baillie-Saunders. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)
"The Good Comrade." By Una L. Silberrad. (Constable, 6s.)

The passionate woman is a creation of Mr. Burgin's, but as the title of his novel denotes she is not the only woman who enters into the life of the irresponsive and cynical Hubert Mallinson, author. The passionate woman had some excuse for her passion. Was she not the young widow of a baronet who by testamentary disposition decreed that so long as his widow remained unmarried his three silk hats, three pair of gloves, and three overcoats, neatly folded, should be displayed in the hall of her house with the eyes of his portrait looking down upon them? Was she not a brilliant, bewitching personality, pulsing with life and waywardness? One regrets that Ernestine, "robed in white samite, mystic, wonderful," should have traversed her path, for she, too, is a charming specimen of womanhood, and the conflict between them for the possession of Mallinson necessitates the story ending on the tragic note. It is a brilliant novel, bubbling over with wit and humour, yet not destitute of the human interest which is never absent from Mr. Burgin's work.

Another sort of woman altogether is the heroine of "The Invader." She is the possessor of a dual personality. As Milly she is the domestic saint of the British fireside, while as Mildred she is a fascinating society beauty at whose conduct Milly is aghast. Milly, indeed, is at times possessed by the spirit of her great grandmother, the notorious Lady Hammerton, whose portrait bears an extraordinary resemblance to her. It is a difficult story Miss Woods has set herself to tell, but she conquers all difficulties with extraordinary ingenuity, and a most exciting romance is the result. The book gains in piquancy, too, from the fact of the principal scenes being set in Oxford, which gives Miss Woods' gift of deft characterisation many opportunities for kindly portraiture.

Some of the other women are to be found in "London Lovers," but they are not attractive specimens, and why their stupidities and their pettinesses, their follies and their vulgarities should have been detailed at such length passes the comprehension of man. For four hundred and twenty-four solid pages Miss Baillie-Saunders analyses and dissects her characters, describes their uninteresting doings, retails their vapid conversations until one feels murderously inclined towards every one of them. The climax is reached on p. 423 where the male lover takes the female lover in his arms under a cherry tree in Kensington Gardens and—shakes her. If he had only done so on p. 23, and so rendered the other 400 pages unnecessary!

Miss Silberrad also supplies a lengthy volume, but comparison between her work and Miss Baillie-Saunders' is impossible. Not one of the 366 pages of "The Good Comrade" is superfluous. She manages to give to her pictures of life the charm which is to be found in the paintings of the old Dutch masters. Her characters are neither models of impossible perfection nor grotesque masks of vice. She does not depend for her interest upon melodramatic situation, but merely upon the ordinary interests of every-day humanity, and this latest work cannot fail to add to a reputation already high.

NOTES.

Mr. Heinemann has issued in two volumes (17s. net) a translation by Mr. A. E. Zimmern of the first part of Signor Guglielmo Ferrero's important work on "The Greatness and Decline of Rome," which appeared in Italy some years ago, but has not hitherto been published in English. These two volumes contain a history of the age of Cæsar, from the death of Sulla to the Ides of March.

"With a Camera in Majorca" (Putnam's, 7s. 6d. net) is another delightful book of travel by Miss Margaret D'Este, of whose "Through Corsica with a Camera" many readers will have pleasant recollections. As in that volume, the illustrations are from photographs by Mrs. R. M. King.

One of the recent additions to Messrs. A. and C. Black's famous series of colour books is a volume on "Cambridge" (20s. net), with letterpress by Mr. M. A. R. Tuker and illustrations by Mr. William Matthison. Mr. Tuker gives an interesting sketch of the history of the university and the colleges, and includes a chapter on Girton and Newnham which have not previously been dealt with in an account of the University. Cambridge, he observes, cannot be otherwise than proud of its position as pioneer university in the higher education of the women of the country; the women's colleges count as one of its glories. "They belong to its atmosphere of vitality and growth; their presence adds something to that air of newness and renewal which has never been absent from the University town." Mr. Matthison's charming pictures, some seventy-six in number, have been admirably reproduced in colour.

IN HONOUR'S NAME. 6s.
By A. KUPRIN. Translated by W. F. HARVEY, M.A.

The publication of this book in Russia was, for a long time, forbidden by the Censor. On the veto being removed, however, its success was instantaneous. It is a scathing exposure of the seamy side of life in the Russian Army.

THE JUDGE. 3s. 6d.
By ELIA W. PEATTIE.

A dramatic psychological study. The principal theme is a murder mystery so skilfully constructed that the interest of the reader is arrested throughout. The solution of the mystery is undertaken by a journalist whose methods are unique in this class of fiction.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.

"If Miss Bowen had never written 'The Viper of Milan,' her new book 'The Glen o' Weeping' would have assured her of a place in the front rank of the historical novelists of the day."
YORKSHIRE EVENING POST.

"A Jolly Good Tale."

After enumerating all the qualities that the "Glen o' Weeping" has not, the Daily Mail says, "BUT IT IS A JOLLY GOOD TALE, TOLD IN EXACTLY THE RIGHT WAY." There is much more that could be said in its praise, as witness the quotations below, but this alone is sufficient to explain the extraordinary popularity of Marjorie Bowen's new novel—it is a jolly good tale. It is such a good tale that more than sixty reviewers have recommended it to five million newspaper readers. It is such a good tale that when you have read it you will want everyone you know to read it too. It is such a good tale that in two weeks it has become the best known novel of the season.

The Glen o' Weeping.

The SCOTSMAN says:— "The Massacre of Glencoe thrilled the Scotland of its day. It still has power to appeal, and especially when, as here, those who acted for good or ill in the ghastly affair are presented to the eye of a later generation in such vivid word pictures. To tell the story would be to deprive the reader of a genuine pleasure. In the library such a novel as this might be placed not very far from those in which the Master of Historical Romance made such admirable use of Scottish history."

The MORNING POST says:— "In 'The Glen o' Weeping' we have all the elements of her previous triumph. A vivid narrative, powerful and direct appeals to the emotions, a keen eye for a dramatic situation, and above all a power of visualising her characters so that they impose themselves on the imaginations of her readers."

The DAILY TELEGRAPH says:— . . . It is all admirably done, and we can commend the structure of the story as heartily as the characterisation."

The Glen o' Weeping.

A SECOND IMPRESSION IN THE PRESS.

Arminel of the West.

A Novel of Mid-Devon by John Trevena, Author of "A Pixy in Petticoats." 6s.

The DAILY TELEGRAPH says:— "The Western Country of Devon and Cornwall is getting a very notable band of novelists to render its romance. The latest accession to their numbers is Mr. John Trevena, whose early story, 'A Pixy in Petticoats,' won him golden opinions, and whose new book, 'Arminel of the West,' will make him many new friends."

Ten Years of Locomotive Progress. By GEO. MONTAGU.

Illustrated. 6s. net.

The SPECTATOR says:— "Mr. Montagu has happily combined a good deal of useful technical knowledge with his popular treatment of the subject, and we can congratulate him on a timely book which will serve to remind the public of what we owe to railway engineers. It has numerous illustrations of all the locomotive types."

In the month of March, while the gross earnings of eighty roads exhibited the large increase of $18,558,000, expenses rose at an even greater rate, the net outcome being a decrease of $207,000. The railroads, as Mr. Clews pertinently observes, are really facing a serious problem—that of providing increased facilities when profits are diminishing and rates of interest advancing. Under ordinary circumstances they would recoup themselves by an advance in freight rates, but the present state of public opinion renders such a policy wholly inadvisable.

So far as new issues are concerned, only within the last week no less than eight companies have announced, or been credited with being on the point of announcing, important new loans. The issues actually decided upon include $15,000,000 by the Interborough Metropolitan, $5,000,000 by the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Louis, $10,000,000 by the Delaware and Hudson, $10,000,000 by the Rock Island, and $5,000,000 by the Erie—the last named taking the form of a one year advance from Messrs. J. P. Morgan, presumably because a bond issue was found impossible. Further, the Brooklyn Rapid Transit proposes to raise $25,000,000, the New York Central is understood to be negotiating for a loan of $15,000,000, and there have even been vague rumours that the United States Steel Trust is going to pass round the hat, in spite of the large cash balance shown in the recent report. This constant stream, one might almost term it flood, of new scrip would require some placing even if general conditions were most promising, and the public was in the market. But with things as they are, new loans could hardly be more unwelcome, and apparently they can only be taken up at the expense of further liquidation of existing securities.

Canadian Rails and the Crops—Grand Trunks—The Third Preference and Ordinary Compared—South American Rails and the Realisation of a Deceased Estate—Antofagastas, Havanas, and Leopoldinas.

Canadian Rails have not escaped the depression that was common to the Stock Markets generally last week, though this department showed more backbone than most, and the various attempts made to rally prices, while thwarted for the time being by surrounding conditions, are useful indications of what is likely to happen when the House recovers from its fit of the blues. The market has got over the fright administered a week previously by the crop scares. According to recent advices, the prospects are excellent, and farmers are sanguine of production being fully up to the average. The heavy snowfall of the past winter assured an abundance of moisture in the soil, which is an important factor. Winter wheat, of which a shortage is reported from the States, is not grown extensively in Canada. Seeding has by now been pretty well completed, and as wheat matures in from ninety to a hundred days, there is ample time for the crops to be harvested before any damage could result from early frosts. Although the acreage under wheat will probably not exceed last year's total, an increase is looked for in oats, barley, flax, and other secondary crops. To those in want of a likely Canadian Railway stock, I still regard Grand Trunk Third preference as one of the cheapest in the group. Making liberal allowance for increased working expenses, there can be little doubt that the full 4 per cent. will be earned upon this stock in respect of 1907, with a comfortable margin to spare. A buyer, therefore, at the present price may reasonably count upon a yield of 5½ per cent., while in view of the steady influx of immigrants to Canada, and the consequent increase year by year in the area of land under cultivation, the surplus margin should continue to widen.

As regards the ordinary it is necessary to speak with reserve. It takes £224,000 net revenue—which would mean probably more than three times that sum in gross revenue—to pay even 1 per cent. on Little Trunks, and that, of course, is after Thirds have received their full 4 per cent. Now, assuming Trunk ordinary gets 1 per cent. in the course of the next few years, will it be particularly cheap at the existing price of around 30? My readers may answer the question themselves, after observing that the yield would be only a little over 3¼ per cent., and it would require the surmounting of another Alps in the shape of £224,000 more net revenue (without allowing for any growth in fixed charges in the interim) before the next 1 per cent. was forthcoming. Yet what would be the position of the Third preference when the ordinary stock was in receipt of 1 per cent.? With a margin behind it of over £200,000, it would take its place amongst high-class investment stocks, and ought to stand in the neighbourhood of par. I have dealt with this aspect of the situation before, but in view of the many queries that still reach me as to the advisability of buying Trunk ordinary for investment, it is advisable to go over the ground again. Little Trunks, from the lowness of their price and the large amount of stock in creation (£22,476,000), will no doubt continue to be a favourite amongst the gamblers, but the man who wants a stock with proved merits, and one which also possesses good scope for capital improvement (the two primary considerations for every investor), will, of course, select Thirds.

In the Foreign Railway Market a severe shrinkage has occurred in prices during the week, due, I believe, more than anything else to forced realisations in connection with the estate of a recently deceased millionaire, who was known to have had a partiality for South American securities. The movements in detail amongst Colonial and Foreign Rails may be gathered from the following table:—

Antofagasta deferred recorded a further drop of eight points. The decline here has no doubt been facilitated by the new issue of £1,000,000 five per cent. debentures, though this is a matter that should benefit the company in the long run, as the money is being laid out on works that are likely to be highly remunerative, including the establishment of new pipe lines for water from the Cordilleras, and construction work at the relief port of Mejillones. The disclosure in the recent debenture prospectus of estimated net profits for 1906 of £380,000 was also rather disappointing to the market. If this figure be borne out by the accounts, due in June or July, it would mean that an expansion of £200,000 in gross receipts had yielded only £14,000 as extra net profit. After deducting debenture charges and 5 per cent. on the preference and preferred ordinary stocks, the balance remaining should be £157,000. This represents about 9½ per cent. on the deferred, without making any allowance for reserve and renewal funds. Exactly how much the board will distribute is, of course, a matter of conjecture, but the dividend (inclusive of the 2½ per cent. interim payment) should not be less than 7 per cent. On that basis Antofagasta deferred would return a yield of 5½ per cent., which, with prospects thrown in, makes the stock by no means unattractive. The new debentures, by the way, are splendid value amongst good class stocks, returning nearly 5 per cent. They still stand around the issue price of 103, and redemption is at 110 per cent. in 1940, unless the stock is repaid sooner by purchase in the market or by public tender.

Another stock that has been roughly handled lately is United of Havana ordinary. No doubt the fall has been due partly to doubts as to how far the company's recent policy of expansion—which has involved a liberal addition to its capital obligations—is justified, but during the past fortnight the price has been directly affected by the traffic returns, which superficially look very poor. The fact of the matter is that the sugar crop was gathered earlier this year than last, and recent traffic comparisons have consequently not been on all fours. Taking the aggregate result from July 1, the company shows an increase in receipts of £403,700, which is good enough after making allowance for the big increase in the mileage. The estimate formed by some market men is that Havanas will get at the rate of 7 per cent. next October, making with the interim dividend of 5 per cent. a total of 6 per cent. for the twelve months. The expectation is not an unreasonable one, and therefore the stock in the early nineties is hardly overpriced, especially in view of the prospects held out of a bigger sugar crop next season. Taking a jump from Cuba to Brazil, traffic returns have also had an undue effect upon Leopoldina ordinary. What some holders have lost sight of in looking at the recent falling off in earnings is the fact that at this time last year the receipts for the six weeks from the middle of April were quite abnormal on account of the carriage of traffic that had been delayed through the floods which occurred in the early spring. Up to the middle of April of this year the Leopoldina's traffics showed an increase of £142,000. This gain has since been reduced to £114,000, and a further shrinkage is likely during the next two or three weeks. After that the basis of comparison will be normal, and when the new coffee crop comes forward, in July, a fresh run of more or less substantial increases may be looked for. I therefore see no reason to modify the very favourable view I took of Leopoldinas in Truth of the 15th inst. As the chairman pointed out at the recent meeting, the ordinary stock would last year have got 5 per cent. but for the floods, which directly and indirectly cost £55,000. Consequently, barring accidents, the whole of the money saved as net out of the increase in gross receipts during the current twelvemonth will go to swell the surplus over and above 5 per cent. There is, too, the further "bull" point connected with the extension of the dates at which the company's lines in Minas revert to the State from 1950 to 1999. The full details of the arrangement have yet to be published, but the outcome will be a substantial reduction in the amount (at present £50,000) which has to be set aside as sinking fund.

Business in Kaffirs Quiet—A Dull Tendency Under the Influence of the Spread of the White Miners' Strike, but No Heavy Selling So Far—Rhodesians also Lower.

Once again it has to be written that conditions in the Mining Markets have been anything but cheerful. Business on the whole has remained on a comparatively small scale, and the general tendency has been dull. In the case of Kaffirs, the chief influence, of course, has been the strike of white miners on the Rand, and the cables to hand from day to day having shown the movement to be spreading, the disinclination to lend support to these descriptions has increased rather than otherwise. While, however, the general trend of share values has been in the downward direction, there has not been heavy selling of Kaffirs, and the temporary rallies that have taken place in the leading speculative counters have indicated that the "bears" are not willing to leave their commitments open for any length of time. News of the collapse of the strike would no doubt be heralded by a smart recovery in prices, but the outlook for the market, I may remind my readers, does not depend solely upon this phase of the labour question, there still being uncertainty to remove in regard to the retention or replacement of the Chinese. Before the next month is out, however, the anxiously awaited "definite statement" as to the intentions of the Transvaal Government should be made. Below I give a table of prices of the Kaffir speculative favourites, and it will be seen that the falls on the week are not very serious:—

With regard to the strike of white employees on the Rand, it is a satisfactory feature that, although the movement has spread, only a few stamps have, apparently, ceased working. Most of the mines which are contributors to the Transvaal gold output are affected, but so far little difficulty has been experienced in filling the places of the strikers, and the production of the precious metal continues on a somewhat reduced scale. According to a cable from the Financial Times' Johannesburg correspondent, a large proportion of the men who have struck have not done so from dissatisfaction, but have been influenced by terrorism. The question is whether the movement will continue to spread so that it becomes necessary to stop milling at a good many of the mines. This is an important point, bearing, as it does, upon the world's gold output and the money market, and the views that have been expressed by market men in regard to the possibility of a suspension of production by the mines of the Rand indicate that a very clear idea of the actual state of affairs does not prevail in some quarters. It should be recognised that the men who have struck are those who have been supervising the rock-drilling operations underground—the breaking down of the ore in order that it may be sent to the surface for treatment. These men did not do the work themselves, but merely overlooked the operations of the unskilled labourers, native or Chinese. It is because they were asked to supervise the working of three drills instead of two that they struck, and the tale has been put about that the object of the mine managements is to reduce the white labour complement. But as has been pointed out by an engineer who has an intimate knowledge of Rand affairs, this cry is not a very convincing one when the whole facts of the situation are known. As a matter of fact, a reduction in the cost of stoping by rock drills, which would be achieved if one man supervised three or four machines, would immediately create an increased requirement for rock-drill miners, because many companies which cannot afford to utilise rock drills to a great extent at the present prohibitive rate would more largely adopt this system if the cost fell within the limits of their means. It is not so much that the companies desire to reduce working costs as that they want more work done for the big wages already being paid; in other words, they want increased efficiency. Dutch recruits have been found to replace the men who have struck work, and so long as the strike is confined to the underground men the mines should be able to continue producing. Where the danger lies is in the possibility that the movement may spread to the engine-drivers. These have to be highly qualified men, and in the event of their joining the strike it would probably not be very easy to find substitutes, in which case the mills would have to stop running and gold production be suspended at the mines affected. But I am hopeful that this drastic step will be averted by a collapse of the strike.

Further attempts have been made to hoist the prices of the shares of the Banket descriptions, but the general trend of prices in the Rhodesian section has been adverse to holders, as the following table of quotations demonstrates:—

Eldorado Bankets have been offered under £2 apiece during the past week, compared with the price of £3 ruling a few weeks ago. As a speculative lock-up they seem a hopeful purchase about 1¾, the price at which they stood when I dealt at some length in my notes with the position and prospects of the company. Any time now news may come to hand of crushing having been commenced at this company's property.

Westralians Inactive But Not Devoid of Interest—Oroya Dividend Reduced—Great Boulder's Developments at Depth.

Although business in Westralians has not been very brisk during the past week this department has received more attention than some other sections of the Mining Markets, and the tendency has not been all one way. Here and there a little improvement in prices has occurred, as the following table shows:—

Interest in Associated which was revived a few weeks back has died down again in consequence of the further cable from Mr. Feldtmann reporting that as a result of his special exploration work he has found nothing to indicate any extension of the Iron Duke chute southerly, "other than on the line of inclined winze." This announcement has increased the fear that this famous ore-body has become impoverished after leaving the Oroya, but it may be remembered that difficulty was also experienced in tracing its course in that property. Some attention has been attracted to Oroyas during the past week by the dividend announcement, the amount declared—2s. 6d. per share—comparing with previous quarterly distributions of 4s. per share. But the price of the shares has not suffered, the reduction having been foreshadowed a few months ago, as my readers may remember. Even at the smaller rate the shares yield a return of nearly 30 per cent. per annum. How long it will be practicable to maintain distributions of 2s. 6d. per quarter it is impossible to say with anything like exactness, but I think those who have the shares may as well continue to hold, as in addition to its own mine the company holds over one-third of the share capital of the Oroya Black Range, which, according to all accounts, is a promising proposition.

Great Boulders have been in some request on the strength of the news received from the mine, and in a more active market the price would probably have gone still better, considering the nature of that news. The cable shows that at the north end of the 2,050 ft. level the lode is 8 ft. wide and assays as high as 25 dwts. per ton, while at the south end the value is 15 dwts. over a width of 5 ft. This announcement is of more than ordinary importance in view of the fact that the developments are the deepest on the Kalgoorlie Field, so that as well as making cheerful reading for Great Boulder shareholders the information is calculated to encourage those interested in the neighbouring mines. The cable mentioned also states that the major portion of the retreatment plant is at work. This refers to the plant erected for the treatment of the Great Boulder's slimes. As I pointed out some time ago, the Great Boulder has about half a million tons of accumulated slimes, and it is estimated that they will yield a net profit of about 4s. per ton. The plant when in full working is expected to treat about 400 tons per day, on which basis an additional profit of over £2,000 per month will be earned. For the past year the company paid 3s. in dividends (9d. quarterly), and on this scale the shares at the current price yield nearly 13 per cent. per annum. In view of the nature of developments at depth, to say nothing of the revenue to be derived from the slimes, Great Boulders certainly appear a good mining holding. The annual report of the directors should be issued any time now, and it will be interesting to see how the ore-reserves' computation compares with the previous estimate.

Continued Activity in Copper Shares, and Prices Generally Depressed—The Great Cobar Interim Statement and Mount Elliott Report—Broken Hill Position—Zinc's Progress—The Fall in Orses and Siberian Props.—Talisman Consolidated.

Speculation in Copper shares has continued on a very fair scale. During the past week operators for the fall have had the best of it, thanks to the general depression. The weakness of Americans contributed to the dulness of the copper favourites, and the movements in the price of the metal have also assisted the "bear" party. But a change for the better in general market conditions would no doubt lead to an improvement in this group. The subjoined table shows how prices have fared on the week:—

Investor's Handbook.—The Central Stock Exchange, Ltd. (Established 1893), 66, Cannon-street, London, E.C., now offer this, which contains particulars of Highest and Lowest Prices, Dividends, &c., for a considerable period, post free to any applicant naming this paper.

On Monday quotations further declined, Tintos giving way to 88 mainly under the influence of the fall in the price of the metal and of the failure of a firm of jobbers referred to in a previous column. "Bulls" and "bears" of Great Cobars have been very active of late in the circulation of rumours to assist their operations. It will be remembered that some weeks ago there was talk of an early dividend being declared, £1 per share being the amount foreshadowed. Shortly afterwards it was asserted, on the other hand, that no distribution would be made until the end of the year. This, in turn, met with a denial in the market. Then the board promised a statement as to the company's progress, and this has been anxiously awaited. Now doubts are to a certain extent removed, the directors having issued an interim report, which contains no dividend announcement and does not give any idea when one may be expected. In view of the interest in the shares the following paragraph from the official circular is worth quoting:—

> The price of copper since the properties were taken over has been favourable to the company's operations, with the result that the copper which has been sold has yielded profits considerably in excess of those anticipated in the prospectus, while the cost of production has not been exceeded; but in view of the quantity of copper in course of treatment and of the labour troubles still existing the Board feel confident that they have the support of the shareholders in not announcing a date for the distribution of profits at the present moment, preferring to adopt a conservative policy and maintaining a strong financial position.

The mining position is strong, it being stated that the ore reserves are equivalent to 8½ years' supply at the present rate of extraction, or over 4 years on the projected scale of operations, while the result of development at depth is reported to be very satisfactory. The whole of the new plant, capable of treating 30,000 tons of ore per week (or more than double the present output), is expected to be ready for work early in the new year. But probably what shareholders chiefly want to know is when they may look for a distribution of profits, and as the directors did not see their way to make a statement on this point they might well have given some figures as to the profits that have been and are being earned, so that these interested could have gained some idea of the company's capabilities. Owing to disappointment caused by the official report, the shares have dropped back below £9, and may go still lower in the immediate future, but I am inclined to think a purchase about the present price would turn out well in time. It would, however, probably be as well to take the shares off the market. In view of the recent fall in the value of Mount Elliotts the report of the directors, which has just arrived by mail, has doubtless been read with interest in order to see whether the shares are over or under-valued. I think it will be recognised that they are fully worth the current market price on the basis of the ore reserves alone, these representing a "profit in sight" of over £3 per share, taking copper at £80 per ton. In addition, the company's cash resources represent 30s. per share.

The Broken Hill group, in respect of which I was able in my last notes to record a revival of speculative interest, has not been able to stand up against the general depression. Intrinsic conditions, however, seem favourable to some improvement in prices, and when a more cheerful feeling is entertained in regard to Stock Exchange affairs generally this group should not be slow to reflect the change. It is pointed out that winter is just commencing in Australia, and this is the season during which speculation is usually most active over there. Last week I drew attention to the increased profits earned by the Block 10 and Block 14 companies in the past half-year, and the announcement of these results has been followed by a dividend declaration by the Block 10, the amount being 5s. per share, as compared with 3s. per share this time last year. Zinc Corporations have been depressed by a little selling by tired holders, but the price of the shares has experienced a moderate recovery from the lowest point touched. The latest news to hand by cable as to the Corporation's affairs shows that work is making a steady advance towards the handling of a large tonnage. In order to get the best possible results, the accessories of the treatment plant are to be increased, and, unfortunately, this work is being delayed by the scarcity of labour on the field.

A little more attention has been directed to some of the Siberian descriptions during the past week as a result of the publication of a report upon the area being worked by the Orsk Goldfields. It may be remembered that in the Siberian "boomlet" which occurred some six months ago these shares were run up to nearly £3 apiece, while those of the Siberian Proprietary (the parent company) rose to nearly 17. The report of Messrs. Hooper and Speak, consulting engineers, on the Orsk property, now issued, does not indicate that there was any justification for the high premium established upon the shares by the market; on the contrary, it shows the scrip to be a speculative purchase even at the present much-reduced quotation. The area over which the company has the right of working during the term of its option to purchase is about twenty-nine square miles, but so far operations have been mainly confined to a comparatively small portion. Several reefs of a payable character are stated to have been proved in this section, but the experts in their report express the opinion that "the making of large profits at the moment should continue to be regarded as of secondary importance compared with the main business of demonstrating beyond doubt whether the company should exercise its option to purchase the property." In the event of the option to purchase being exercised (and the Orsk Company has, I believe, only another two years in which to decide), the Siberian Proprietary stands to receive about £150,000, less all sums paid as rent and from ore at grass, etc., having already received £375,000 in Orsk shares for the option. During the past week the parent company's shares have fallen considerably as a result of disappointment caused by the nature of the report above referred to, while Orsks have dropped to a level representing a discount of nearly 50 per cent.

The annual report of the Talisman Consolidated—a New Zealand gold mining company which was lucky enough to strike a "bonanza" chute shortly after reconstructing a few years ago—shows that the profits further increased during the past year. The surplus, after writing off the whole cost of mining development, amounted to £87,212, as compared with £72,237 in 1905, and the balance, after allowing for depreciation of plant, etc., is £69,811, which, with the amount brought forward last year, makes the total sum available £99,334. Four dividends of 1s. per share were paid during the last financial year, and on account of the current year two dividends at the same rate have already been declared. The ore reserves represent about eighteen months' supply on the basis of the past year's scale of operations. The position in this respect might well be stronger, especially as the mine is of the "patchy" order; but there seems no need for holders of the shares to dispose of their interest at present. They should, however, recognise the speculative character of the security, and should carefully watch the course of developments. The dividend yield on the shares at the current market price works out at nearly 14 per cent., the shares being 18s. 6d. paid up.

The Lotiery Bonds Scandal.

It was edifying to observe the prominence which the Daily Mail gave to the admirable remarks on the ethics of advertising which Mr. A. W. Gamage made at the meeting of the shareholders of A. W. Gamage, Limited. Mr. Gamage referred to the manner in which the public are tricked by means of advertisements composed of "wilful misrepresentations," and for the benefit of the press he pointed out that newspapers inserting advertisements of that description must, in the long run, be shunned by respectable traders. He appealed to the press to exercise a strict censorship over every advertisement, but being evidently doubtful whether this is likely to be done voluntarily he advocated the passing of a law "making it a criminal offence to issue an advertisement which upon its face was likely to obtain Romano's Restaurant, Strand.—Truth says:—"On the way down the Strand I dropped in to dine at Romano's. I was glad to see how well the place maintains its old reputation. A better-cooked and better-served dinner no one need desire."

money from the public on what virtually amounted to false pretences." I say that it was edifying to see these remarks in the Daily Mail, because that newspaper's continued publication of the misleading advertisements of the International Securities Syndicate furnishes as striking a proof as could be imagined of the necessity for the censorship Mr. Gamage advocated. Of course, many other daily and weekly papers insert the same advertisements, but the conduct of the Daily Mail in the matter is especially reprehensible, inasmuch as its own City Editor has repeatedly exposed and denounced the very business this International Securities Syndicate is carrying on. The flamboyant advertisements of this concern on the subject of Continental Government and municipal lottery or premium bonds—such as those headed, "The Question of Safe Investment," "Millionaires in the Making," "Governments Giving Away Fortunes," and so forth—are palpably designed to deceive and delude the class of small investors to whom they are particularly addressed. In effect they are advised to take their money out of the Post Office Savings Bank in order to "invest" it in premium bonds, and I have heard of many cases in which poor and ignorant people have been humbugged into doing this. The prices at which the bonds are unloaded upon them are greatly in excess of the current quotations on those Continental bourses where dealings in such securities are recognised, so that if a purchaser desires to sell he is at once faced with a heavy loss—probably from 25 to 50 per cent.—of the capital for which the Syndicate has promised him "absolute security." Here is an example. The Syndicate exhorts working men to pay £5 down or £5 5s. by instalments for certain bonds. "For your £5," the advertisement says, "you will get in return scrip, the par value of which is now £8 sterling." From this they ingenuously suppose that they are purchasing for £5 a security now worth £8. As a matter of fact, the bond in question can be bought through brokers in London for £3 12s. 6d. —the Syndicate's over-charge even for cash down being thus £1 7s. 6d.—and for its redemption at par the purchaser, who gets no interest in the meantime, may have to wait, if he lives long enough, to the year 1987. It is, of course, the assurance that they will "participate in the distribution of cash premiums" of enormous value that hooks the majority of the purchasers of bonds of this kind. They are told that by "investing" so much money in various bonds they will obtain so many "opportunities" of "earning a fortune." What they are not told and do not understand is that there are tremendously long odds against their doing anything of the kind owing to the number of the bonds that have been issued and the fact that the drawings in most cases extend over a period of fifty or a hundred years. It is true that some of the bonds—not all—bear interest, and are well secured, but the return is invariably much less than can be obtained from plenty of good English investments; and the man who has had £100 locked up in premium bonds for ten or twenty years without ever having the luck to draw even the most trifling prize, is apt to repent his folly in entering upon such a dreary long-drawn-out gamble instead of being content with some more humdrum but, in the long run, more remunerative use of his money in sound stocks or shares at home.

There are other touting dealers in premium bonds—conspicuous among them being Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. and Melville, Glyn, and Co., of Paris—who in the matter of misleading prospectuses and excessive charges are tarred with the same brush as the International Securities Syndicate. By reason, however, of its lavish expenditure on newspaper advertising, the syndicate has become far and away the most mischievous of the firms engaged in this objectionable business. There is an objection to it over and above the fact that the bonds are palmed off on ignorant buyers at outrageously exorbitant prices. It is clearly contrary to the public welfare that people of the class to whom these advertisements chiefly appeal should be gulled into employing their savings in what is really a system of gambling under the impression all the time that it is a safe and desirable investment. Until a few months ago it was always assumed that dealings in these so-called premium bonds were illegal in this country. In a prosecution at the Westminster Police-court last January, however, the magistrate expressed the opinion that the Lottery Act did not apply to bonds of this description; and since then the traffic in them has enormously increased. I would suggest to the Public Prosecutor that, in view of the seriousness of this scandal, he ought to take steps to obtain a higher opinion on the point than that of the learned magistrate. Quite possibly it may turn out that his worship was wrong, while if he was right it would be a matter for consideration whether the law should not be altered to prevent the advertising of the bonds in any form, let alone in the grossly deceptive manner which the International Securities Syndicate adopts.

"Vigilant's" Letter Box.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can I reply by post, and as there seems to be a misunderstanding in the minds of many of my readers, I wish to emphasise the fact that a coupon must be attached to every inquiry. A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the coloured cover of TRUTH.

2. Six different stocks are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks an additional coupon or coupons (one for every half-a-dozen stocks) must be forwarded. The answering of many of the inquiries I receive necessitates a great deal of careful research, and I shall therefore be compelled henceforth to enforce this regulation. Its necessity will be apparent when I state that some correspondents send lists of 20 or 30 different stocks covering every class and description of Investment.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

4. Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

5. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

6. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

7. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

8. I do not recommend brokers or solicitors.

Government Securities.

Miser.—As in your case safety should be the first consideration, I would suggest the new India Government 3½ per cent loan, upon which you could obtain a yield of about 3⅝ per cent. C. L., Bilston.—I would suggest the new India Three and a Half per Cent., which was offered at 98½, and stands at about the issue price, thus giving a yield of rather more than 3½. Consols are redeemable at par after 5th April, 1923, but only at the option of the Government.

Railways.

Hutch.—No. 7 is a poor holding and had better be sold. Nos. 4, 10, and 11 are also somewhat doubtful holdings, the maintenance of dividends not being assured, but after the heavy fall that has taken place I would be in no great hurry to realise, especially as in reinvesting you would be limited to low interest-bearing stocks. The others in your list ought to be worth sticking to as permanent investments. Glasgow.—Hold the stocks, which are two of the soundest in the group, but in the present temper of the market I should not like to say the bottom had been reached, and therefore would postpone a further purchase. With regard to your last question it is impossible to say what the effect would be without knowing something of the terms. Hants.—See this week's comments. Naturalist.—They are three good securities, and you ought not to part with them at present prices. Como.—1. The market still takes the matter seriously, and I am inclined to think it will have an important bearing upon prices for some time to come. 2. The American influence has to be kept in mind in attempting to gauge the course of the price, but the stock has such sound merits that you ought not to sell even should the price be further temporarily depressed.

Mines.

Jectona.—From the ordinary business point of view the firm is one of high standing Coupon.—I know of nothing wrong with the property, but for some time there has evidently been a tap on in the shares in the market. You might keep them for dividends for the present. Tyro.—1. I would hold for some recovery. 2. A promising lock-up speculation. Cumberland.—I have not a good opinion of the shares as a holding. W. J. A. B. Rubbish, like the rest of the "low-priced shares" which the Consolidated Securities Company offers as a "safe and profitable" investment. Evidently you did not read my recent remarks on the circulars issued by this concern. A. H. B.—See reference to Great Boulders in my notes this week. I prefer these to the other shares named. Bengal.—I think you would be well advised to exchange into the shares of a longer lived mine.

MIXED.

Renfrew.—As regards the mine shares you might keep Strattons for the present, but had better take what you can for the others. The latter advice also applies to "Slubbers, but the other textile shares might be kept for the present. Have nothing to do with the syndicate or any other touting dealers in lottery bonds. Cheshire.—All of them good industrials. Huntsman.—1. There is more prospect of an early rise in Trunk Thirds. 2, 3, and 4. All sound investments. Provisional.—1. Not very attractive. 2 and 3. Hopeful holdings for dividends. 4. Speculative, and I think you would be likely to do better elsewhere 5. Hold. Twickenham.—Your securities are all of the right sort, and I see no occasion to advise the sale of any. Provide.—1 and 2. Neither is a first-class investment, but the security is fair, and the stocks should be good enough to buy for mixing purposes. 3. A fair commercial investment. 4. Not an attractive holding. Dubitas.—Nos. 2, 3 and 6 are excellent securities, and it would be a pity to sell now. No. 1 is a little doubtful, though the probability is in favour of the interest being maintained. In any case the stock has already had a substantial fall from the highest price touched recently. 4. An attractive holding of its class. 5. A recovery in the price does not seem improbable within the near future. St. Cecilia.—Speculatively, the "A" Debentures are fairly interesting, but I do not fancy the others. South Durhams would be a hopeful purchase. Fortieth.—You have made a wise selection, and I do not think you could do better than spread your money over the lot. Corbean.—1. Not an attractive holding, and I see no early prospect of redemption. On the whole I should be inclined to get out. 2. The brewery debentures might be held, but you are acting wisely in selling the preference shares. Clinker.—Nos. 1 and 2 are sound investments, and should be held. 3. Hold. 4. Hold for recovery. The outlook as regards the mines in which the company is interested is brighter now than during the past year, and if the labour trouble is soon brought to an end it should not be long before dividends are resumed. Scarboro.—1. You might hold for a partial recovery, but I do not look for any early return to the price at which you bought. 2. The stock is sound enough, and should go better when the labour position becomes more settled. 3. I would hold for some recovery. 4. With markets in such an unsatisfactory state I should not care to predict that the price will be touched in the near future.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Aurora.—1. Yes. 2. Speculative, but a fair holding at the present price. E. R. A., Berbice.—Have nothing to do with the Arnold and Butler bucket-shop. Obviously it is not a method of "investment," but a system of gambling, the adoption of which would be doubly foolish in the case of a person living so completely out of touch with the markets. Frankfort, J. B., Pendennis, Constant Reader (Bristol), Wheel of Fortune, Cestrian, F. A. B., South-African, and other correspondents. — See my article this week regarding the traffic in "premium bonds" carried on by the International Securities Syndicate, Cunliffe, Russell, and Co., and Melville, Glyn, and Co. Ready Cash.—I have no inside knowledge of the company's affairs; but the fact you mention was in itself significant enough. As to the second question, if there is some "secret cause," I am not in the secret. E. H. P.—This so called "bank" has already been dealt with in TRUTH. Fabrius.—1. I have not had occasion to criticise the firm; but see Rule 8. 2 and 3. No. 4. The tramway shares would be a fair commercial investment, but the others are extremely speculative. Ilfracombe.—Neither is at all promising, and you would be ill-advised to put money into breweries now. Policeman.—1. Yes. 2. See first part of answer to "Fabrius." Solitary.—1. There is such a lottery, but the circulars as to the prizes and the drawings are grossly misleading. 2. A cover-snatching firm which you should avoid. J. L. N. A.—The criticisms to which you refer were dealt with at the meeting reported in Friday's financial papers, when the chairman stated that the company was in a thoroughly sound position. R. B. S.—I think "The History, Law and Practice of the Stock Exchange" (Pitman and Sons, 5s.) would give you the information you require. Curdridge.—Better realise and put the money into something with greater promise. Pad.—Attempts are being made towards lifting the concern out of the mud, but it is doubtful whether they will prove successful. Better cut the loss. O. E. A.—It naturally means a considerable reduction in the return. Change into Chinese Fives. Tankerton.—Very little is known of the concern, but it is still in existence. J. H.—Thanks for your information. P. L.—See the answer respecting this concern under the head of "Mines." Argyll.—I am making inquiries, and I hope to answer your questions next week.

INDUSTRIALS STAGNANT—NEW FOUNDERS' FLUTTER—CALLENDER'S CABLES—DESIRABLE MOTOR SHARES—'BUS COMPANIES DOING BADLY—LYONS' SPLENDID RESULTS.

The change for the better which it was hoped (rather than expected) might come over the Miscellaneous market after the holiday is not yet visible. The condition of affairs generally remains stale, flat, and unprofitable. There are not a few good, sound industrials standing at a price which ought to tempt the genuine investor, but he shows little inclination to pick up these plums. Speculation, too, remains practically at a standstill. During the past few days there has been another small flutter in New Founders' shares, which have been put up on the strength of a report that a definite statement regarding the Turkish match monopoly will be forthcoming this week. Some people are evidently persuaded that the statement will be favourable, but even if all the difficulties as to the concession were to be at last surmounted—and this is a very big "if"—the shares would still be a gamble which I should be sorry to recommend. Pekin Syndicates and Shansis are unaltered, and here again some definite information from the directors is anxiously awaited. Hudson's Bays have had a further relapse on continued realisations. Anglo "A's" have exhibited some degree of weakness, in contrast to the improvement of Anglo "B's"—an improvement shared by several securities in the Telegraph group, for which there appears to have been a steady investment demand. In this connection reference may be made to the rise in the ordinary shares of Callender's Cable and Construction Company, on which a dividend of 15 per cent. for 1906 has been declared. There are necessarily considerable fluctuations in the profits of this concern, owing to the considerable fluctuations in the prices of the raw materials, including copper and other metals, which it uses. Since 1896, however, the dividend has never been less than 10 per cent., and during the ten succeeding years the average rate of distribution has been about 14½ per cent. The company's business is not confined to the manufacture of cables, but embraces the laying down of complete mains for the distribution of electricity for lighting, traction, and other purposes, so that it should benefit from the extension of electrical enterprise of all kinds. The ordinary shares, yielding at the present price a little over 7 per cent., seem to be an attractive commercial investment.

Motor shares have again been neglected, though on every hand one hears of the increasing prosperity of the industry. The advice that I have lately given still holds good, and at the existing quotations Daimlers and Argylls in particular are highly promising purchases. On the basis of last year's dividend Argylls, for instance, yield nearly 9 per cent., and the company is now in a stronger position and, it is believed, doing an increased trade. Among iron, steel, coal, and engineering companies' securities scarcely any movements have occurred, and in this department also some hopeful purchases can now be made. Considering the sound position of the company, Vickers, Sons and Maxim ordinary shares are well worth buying at a price giving a return of 6 per cent.; while South Durham Steels, on which the yield is about 10 per cent., also seem to be under-valued. London General Omnibus Company stock has had a very severe fall in the last fortnight, the outcome of the continued unsatisfactory traffic returns, which show a substantial loss since the beginning of the year. There has likewise been a decrease in the receipts of the Road Car Company; and meanwhile nothing more has been heard of the reported arrangement between the various old and new 'bus companies for levelling up unremunerative fares and abandoning or restricting the present system of cut-throat competition. The Greenwich Inlaid Linoleum Company reports a profit for the past year of £79,859, being an increase of nearly £10,000 on the preceding year, and for the sixth year in succession the ordinary shareholders receive a dividend of 15 per cent. This company was in serious trouble for some time after its formation, but after a drastic reduction of the capital it entered upon a career of steady prosperity, and at the existing quotation the ordinary shares, yielding over 6 per cent., may be regarded as a desirable industrial investment.

The event of the week in this market was, of course, the publication of the report of J. Lyons and Co., Limited. Other catering companies may be at a standstill, or even (as some are) on the down-grade, but Lyons, in spite of the keenness of competition, continue to do an increasingly large and profitable business.

CURIO CLUB.—All those interested in Curio-hunting for profit are invited to communicate with the Secretary of the London Opinion Curio Club, 107, Regent-street. There are many features of interest to those interested in Antiques and Works of Art. Prospectus gratis.

What an enormous and growing business it is may be gathered from the fact that the gross profits for the year ended March 31 last were £728,281, as compared with £666,550 in the previous year, while the net profits were £231,849, as compared with £192,646. The amount set aside for depreciation is increased from £42,294 to £50,177, and £40,000 has been placed to reserve, bringing that fund up to £440,000. For 1905-6 the dividend on the ordinary shares was 30 per cent., and there was a bonus of 2½ per cent. For the past year the total distribution is the same, but instead of being made up in bonus the dividend itself is 32½ per cent.—a fact from which it may perhaps be inferred that the directors fully expect to be able to maintain this figure. The remarkable results that have been achieved are a proof of the excellence and enterprise of the management, and in view of the important contracts that have been secured for this year and next it will not be at all surprising if the present wonderful record is beaten. There had apparently been an expectation in some quarters that out of the increased profits the company would this year pay an increased dividend; but the directors have acted quite justifiably in preferring rather to make a more substantial provision for depreciation and reserve. This prudent course ought, indeed, to deepen the confidence of the public in the company, whose shares I have repeatedly commended to the notice of my readers as a remarkably good commercial investment.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

HOVIS-BREAD FLOUR COMPANY, LIMITED.

The annual meeting of the shareholders of the Hovis-Bread Flour Co., Ltd., was held yesterday at Westminster Palace Hotel, S.W., Mr. J. Browne-Martin presiding. In moving the adoption of the Report and payment of a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum upon the ordinary shares, the Chairman said that during the year they had paid out of capital account £42,361, the main portion being expended on the equipment of the new mill at Manchester, the cost of which would be in excess by about £7,000 above the £60,000 for which an issue of debentures was authorised. As it had been difficult to obtain money this year the directors decided not to issue the balance of the £30,000 debentures to the public, and therefore they had made arrangements with their bankers for an overdraft on satisfactory terms, the bankers being secured on the issue to them of the £30,000 debentures. The net profit in trading had amounted to £36,079, which all must consider satisfactory. Having spoken of the nutritious character of Hovis Bread, especially in the dieting of children, the Chairman referred to the increased price of wheat, which he said would adversely affect them in the current year. They desired to keep their production at a regular standard, and they had found on previous occasions when the price of wheat had gone up, that it had been the best policy for them not to raise the price of Hovis Flour. As a set-off they had the prospect of a full year's work at their new mill with the advantages of great saving in cost and delivery. Mr. Helvey seconded the motion, which was unanimously adopted.

INSURANCE NOTES.

A KNOTTY POINT AND THE REMEDY—THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN POLICIES—MAGNITUDE V. MERIT.

AN interesting question about the new liability to domestic servants is raised by one of my correspondents. His contention is that an insurance company indemnifies only against claims which can be made under various Acts or at common law, and he holds that there can be no claim against the company in respect of any payment before the contract of service is determined. This seems to necessitate notice to quit on the occurrence of an accident, and, until the expiration of such notice, usually one month, it does not appear that the company is liable for any payment. Most decent people would pay their servants full wages and provide them with board and lodging, at any rate for a time, and would not give them notice to quit because they had met with an accident. The question raised is whether an insurance company would pay the compensation to which the servant is legally entitled if the employer paid full wages and did not give the servant notice. My correspondent asks for my opinion on the point, which I am glad to give, though frankly my notions on the subject are rather vague. The Acts of 1897 and 1906 are so worded as to apply principally to workmen in trades where only short notice—frequently one hour—is required to terminate the contract. Domestic servants, who are usually subject to a month's notice, and clerks or secretaries, who might sometimes be entitled to three months' notice, are included under the Act, but sundry of its provisions fit such cases very badly. There are decisions under the Act of 1897 that the normal conditions of service, including payment of full wages, are either terminated or suspended by the happening of an accident, but so far as I can judge, in cases where full wages were paid during temporary incapacity, whether from accident or illness, the servant would not claim compensation under the Act, since it would be of no benefit to do so. The Act provides that in fixing the amount of the weekly premium for compensation regard should be had to any payment which the workman receives from the employer, and the workman cannot receive under the Act a total payment in excess of his normal wages. Thus my correspondent's point seems to resolve itself into this: If, irrespective of the Workmen's Compensation Act, the employer continues to pay full wages for, say, one month, the new Act imposes no extra liability upon him, and ordinary insurance policies would not yield him any compensation. So long as the employer pays full wages the servant would be a fool to make any claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, unless the incapacity were likely to be permanent. Failing a claim being made, I do not see how the insurance company could pay; consequently we apparently arrive at the practical conclusion that the proper course is for an employer to agree with the servant that wages are on account of compensation. If possible, the consent of the insurance company should be obtained. Fortunately, there is a remedy, since most of the companies issue policies which cover more than what is supposed to be the mere legal liability, and pay full wages for at least a month from the date of the accident.

Last week I referred to a policy-holder who took an endowment assurance policy a few years ago which yielded him greatly inferior results to those he could have obtained from making a better selection, and I suggested the advisability of taking advice before assuring rather than afterwards. I suppose it was this note which induced a correspondent, aged thirty-five, to consult me before completing a proposal for life assurance which he was on the point of making. He contemplated paying £41 0s. 10d. a year for the assurance of £1,000, with profits in addition, at the end of twenty-five years or at death if previous. According to the last bonus declared by the company he contemplated going to, the bonuses would amount to £300 at the end of twenty-five years, so that if he lived till sixty he would receive £1,300. This company recently failed to declare a bonus, and neither its financial status nor its prospect for future profits is particularly good. In a much stronger company he can obtain a policy for an annual premium of £40 0s. 10d., which is practically certain to increase to £1,500 by the end of twenty-five years. Since he can save £1 a year in the premiums that he pays, and £8 a year in the bonuses that he receives, it is obvious that he would do well to reconsider his half-formed decision. The same premium paid to the better of the two companies would yield him, at the end of twenty-five years, £118 for every £100 he would receive from the inferior company, besides which the security and the prospect of maintaining the present rate of bonus is much greater in the better office than in the worse.

The differences between the polices issued by various companies are so great, as the above example, which is by no means an extreme instance of this, shows, that I cannot help wondering why the public does not recognise how much better they can do by going to a good office than to a bad one. Yet if we look at the amount of new assurances issued by the life offices, we find, on the whole, that the inferior companies do a much larger new business than the superior offices; in fact, in many cases it is the large amount of new business which makes a company inferior when judged by the results that it gives to its policy-holders. What with commission to agents, medical fees, and other expenses connected with the issue of new policies, a large new business is very apt to prove so expensive as to diminish the profits available for policy-holders. I am quite aware that managers who desire to make their companies big contend that the new business is well worth what it costs, because an influx of people who have recently passed a medical examination improves the mortality experienced by a company, and that what is paid away for increased expenses is recovered by an improved death rate. This is perfectly true within certain limits, but the limits are very narrow, and are undoubtedly exceeded by a great many companies whose craze for a big new business involves loss to the existing policy-holders.

Extravagant expenditure for the purpose of obtaining a lot of new policy-holders every year prevails among proprietary life assurance companies much more than among mutual offices. The proprietors nearly always take a share of the profits, and for the shareholders it is more remunerative to participate in a small rate of profit on a big business than in a high rate of profit on a small business; for the policy-holders the reverse is the case. It is entirely immaterial to them whether the company in which they are assured is large or small, but it is very important to them, if they participate in profits, that the bonuses should be good. I do not at all imply that this tendency to produce good results for the shareholders and bad results for the policy-holders is characteristic of all proprietary life companies; in many of these the welfare of the policy-holders is just as much the concern of the management as it is in mutual offices. To make it so is really the wisest course in the interests of the shareholders themselves. Sooner or later the foolish policy of seeking magnitude at the expense of merit is bound to be found out, and to reveal the disastrous consequences which it involves; then there comes trouble for the shareholders and the management: the policies cannot be sold on their merits, and additional expense has to be incurred in obtaining business. The best agents seek appointments with a company it is easier to work for, or they can only be retained by high salaries and big commissions. Then the public has to be tempted by the allowance of rebates on the premiums paid, the expenses go up still higher, the bonuses go down still lower, and so the process goes on. At last there comes a time when for five years or ten years there is no bonus at all, drastic measures have to be taken, and if the new management proves prudent, the company may recover in fifteen or twenty years, or, it may be, its inglorious career terminates in the sale of the business to another office.

These things happen solely because the public is so foolish: if people would but choose their policies well, the good companies would obtain a large new business at a very small cost, the bad companies would not be able to obtain a large new business at any cost, and would thereby tend to improvement and to better results for their policy-holders.

QUEER STORY.

PHILJIM'S DERBY.

Among the prominent horses in the Derby betting in the year of which I write was Reuben Sarsfield's bay colt Philjim, by The Joker out of Piebald Piety. This mare had been bred and reared by Sarsfield at his stud farm near Amesbury, and though she never did much on the Turf, she proved herself a decidedly useful animal at the stud.

Sarsfield's character, whether as a racing man or as a private individual, did not stand high. He was suspected of being utterly unscrupulous, and was known to be entirely godless; not with that careless sort of godlessness that is merely indifferent to all sacred things, but with that more aggressive kind which rather goes out of its way to flout and mock them. It was in this spirit that he had christened his mare Piebald Piety; it was in this spirit also that, when some friend had pointed out to him that May 1, the day of the colt's nativity, was the festival of St. Philip and St. James, he had, with facetious impiety, at once named the animal Philjim.

But, like many another man who derides what he considers the superstitions of Christianity, Reuben Sarsfield was himself, at heart, slave to a superstitious code which was not only incomparably more ignoble, but also incomparably more unreasonable. He believed (I do not say he admitted the belief, but there it was) in all sorts of omens and talismans—in the power of most trivial accidental circumstances to bring good or ill luck. He always avoided walking under ladders. If he spilt the salt at table, he usually contrived, when no one was looking, to throw a pinch of it over his left shoulder. If, when driving to the races, he saw a black cat sitting in a window, it at once elated his spirits and made him sanguine of a good day. If a crow flew across the road, it made him correspondingly gloomy and depressed. Such inconsistencies are, after all, common enough. There are thousands of persons in the same position as the historic marquise who expressed her mental attitude towards ghosts in the significant words: "Je ne les crois pas, mais je les crains." Such, towards the supernatural in general, was the attitude of the scoffer Reuben Sarsfield.

No doubt the life he had led, with its consequent heavy drains upon his constitution, had something to do with it. A man can't go the pace as Sarsfield had gone it without to some extent deranging his nerves. True, he had now for some time abandoned the excesses which had characterised his youth, partly because he was blasé with them, partly because he had at length found it necessary to do so on the score of health. But the effect of those excesses still betrayed itself in the comparative enfeeblement of his once iron nerve. The old air of reckless bravado was still kept up, but it was now, if I may adopt the metaphor, merely token money, of which, while the face value still appeared the same, the intrinsic value had depreciated at least fifty per cent.

Of the many bad deeds that had earned Sarsfield so unsavoury a reputation in his salad days, none was worse than his behaviour towards Lottie Gregson. Lottie was the only daughter of his father's coachman—a pretty village girl, engaged to be married to a young fellow in her own walk of life. Reuben had cast his evil eyes upon her, had stolen her heart away from her betrothed, and finally had persuaded her to go abroad with him. A few weeks before the child was born, he had deserted her in an out-of-the-way Italian town, and left her to her fate. It was not until some time afterwards that he learned—I am afraid with more relief than remorse—that she had died in giving birth to a little girl. What had become of the child he had neither heard nor taken the trouble to inquire. Probably it had followed its mother to the grave. He rather hoped it had.

All this, of course, was ancient history. It had happened twenty-five years ago. And never once during that long interval had the man's conscience been disturbed by one inconvenient twinge. But now at length the memory of the shameful thing began to re-awaken in him, and to occasion him a good deal of latent uneasiness. It was not the uneasiness of remorse—still less of repentance. The cause was this: Reuben Sarsfield had for some years made the winning of the Derby the chief aim and end of his existence. To that object he had devoted his time, his thought, his money without grudge or stint. And now his strenuous efforts seemed likely to be crowned with success, for his colt, Philjim, though not exactly a great horse, had nevertheless, during his two-year-old career, proved himself the pick of a rather moderate lot of contemporaries, and had auspiciously inaugurated his three-year-old season by carrying off the Two Thousand Guineas. Apparently there was nothing in the Derby to beat him; and that such was the generally accepted view was proved by his position at the head of the betting. But all the same Sarsfield felt decidedly uneasy, and lived in mortal terror of something untoward happening to upset this seeming "dead cert," and the reason was simply this—the Derby was to be run that year on May 27.

Now May 27 was the date on which, twenty-five years before, poor Lottie Gregson had paid the penalty of her sin—the sin that lay at her heartless seducer's door—with her life. Sarsfield had a good memory for dates. They fixed themselves (even when connected with the most trivial events) in his memory unconsciously, and remained recorded there. And the coincidence of the Derby that year falling upon the exact date of Lottie's death appeared to Sarsfield in the light of an omen that Nemesis was at work. Indeed, what more in accordance with her methods of retributive justice than that she should select this day, and this opportunity, to pay him out for the old wrong?

He shuffled uneasily in his chair as he thought of it all; then, throwing his half-smoked cigar into the grate, rose and paced his library with a moody frown. "The 27th of May. D——n the date! Why in Philjim's year, of all years, did the Derby fall on that particular day? It meant mischief. He was sure it meant mischief? And yet—— At this point his reflections were interrupted by the entrance of his secretary, Henry Belmore, with a bundle of letters for signature.

"If you will just sign these, sir," he said, "I can get them off by to-night's post."

"All right," answered Reuben, sitting down to his writing-table and taking up a pen. "Let's have 'em. I'll knock 'em off in two or three minutes.' '

And he proceeded to sign letter after letter in his bold, sprawling hand, until the whole bundle was completed. Young Belmore took them up again, but, before leaving the room turned to his employer and said:

"By the way, sir, shall you want me any more this evening? If not, I should rather like to go out for an hour or two."

"D—n it, you're always wanting to go out," answered Sarsfield, in that rude, bullying tone which he usually adopted to his paid employees, his secretary not excepted. "What do you think I pay you two hundred a year for—hey?"

Henry Belmore flushed; but he answered civilly, even deferentially:

"Oh, if you want me, sir, of course I shouldn't think of going."

"Well, I don't want you this evening, as it happens, and so you may go," rejoined his employer, grudgingly. "But we mustn't have too many of these requests for leave off, Belmore, or else you and I shall have to part company. See?"

The secretary, like a wise young man, left the room without a word. While sealing up and addressing the letters, however, in his small office adjoining, he said a good many words to himself about his employer, by way of blowing off steam. When the letters had been sent to post, he went out. It was shortly after eleven o'clock when he returned, and, seeing the lights still burning in the library, he went in to ask if he could do anything more for Sarsfield before going to bed. His employer was by this time in a better temper, having soothed his irritability with three whiskies and sodas, and being now half-way through the fourth. It was not often that he indulged so freely, and the liquor, in addition to improving his temper, had also made him communicative. So he invited the secretary to sit down and join him in a cigar and a chat.

This invitation, which was tantamount to a command, Belmore of course accepted, seating himself in an arm-chair on the other side of the fender. He noticed that Sarsfield's face was unwontedly flushed and that his speech came rather thick. These two circumstances by themselves were sufficient indication to the secretary that his employer, for the first time since he had known him, was somewhat under the influence of liquor, and if any corroboration of the fact were wanting, it was supplied by the unprecedented unreserve with which Philjim's owner now began to talk.

"I say, Belmore," he remarked, apropos of nothing that had been said, but following out the train of thought that was working in his mind, and that, if he had been strictly sober, he would have kept concealed there, "do you believe in anniversaries—eh?"

"In what sense, sir? I do not quite understand," replied the secretary, looking rather mystified.

"Why, I mean, do you believe in the theory that, when fate, or destiny, or vengeance, or whatever you like to call the thing, means to pay a chap out for some past slip, it singles out some particular day especially connected with the slip on which to drop on him, by way of lending point to the operation?"

"Well, really, I can hardly say," replied Belmore, still rather puzzled by the character of the question. "I have never given the matter sufficient thought."

"Look 'ee here, Belmore," said Sarsfield, pursuing to still greater lengths his alcoholic confidences. "I've got something on my mind, the anxiety of which is nearly driving me mad; and I must tell it to some one, or I believe I shall go clean off my head. But this is between you and me, of course—strictly between you and me—eh?"

"You may rely on my discretion, sir. It shall not go beyond me," replied the secretary.

"Fact is," continued his employer, "when I was a young man, Belmore, I did a d——d silly thing. I ran away with the daughter of my father's coachman. She thought I was going to marry her. I may have led her to suppose so. A man is more or less bound to raise false hopes of that kind in the girl's breast on such occasions. It is part of the game. You understand me—eh, Belmore?" he added, with a knowing leer.

"Oh, quite, sir," rejoined the secretary.

"I didn't marry her, of course," pursued Sarsfield. "Silly young ass as I was, my silliness stopped short of that. I stuck to her for nearly a year, though, which is more than many men would have done. And then I got sick of her everlasting tearful appeals to me to make her an honest woman. In fact, I could stand them no longer. So I gave her the slip and came back to England (we were in Italy at the time), leaving her £50 to see her through her trouble—which, again, is more than many men would have done. That is the last I saw of her. But it came to my knowledge afterwards that she had died in giving birth to a little girl. And the day on which she died, as it happened, was the twenty-seventh of May. Now does it strike you that there is anything significant about that date, Belmore?"

The secretary, with a bewildered expression, shook his head.

"Come," went on Sarsfield, regarding him impressively. "Do you not realise that May the 27th, the day on which Lottie died twenty-five years ago, happens to be the very day on which this year's Derby is to be run?"

"Ah! Now you mention it, so it is," answered Belmore, who did not, however, even yet exactly follow the connection.

"And don't you think it possible," demanded Sarsfield, with a perturbed and anxious look, "that there may be something more than a coincidence involved in this circumstance—I mean that Fate may have waited for this anniversary on purpose to pay me out, by bringing about Philjim's downfall at Epsom, and so blasting my apparently certain chance—the only chance I may ever have—of gaining my heart's desire and carrying off the Blue Riband of the Turf?"

Then Belmore saw it all; read in Sarsfield's almost terrified look, even more than in his words, the secret of the superstitious fear—a secret of which he had till now had no inkling—that was working in his employer's mind. For the moment he was too much astonished by the discovery of such superstition in so notorious a scoffer to find words. But seeing that an answer was expected of him, he presently blurted out:—

"Well, sir, if such a thing were to happen, it would at least be a striking coincidence."

"Coincidence?" hiccoughed the perturbed and whiskyfied Sarsfield. "Don't talk to me of coincidences, Belmore. If this thing happens—and I tell you I've a most infernal strong presentiment that it's going to happen—it won't be a coincidence; it will be the finger of Nemesis—of Nemesis, do you hear?"

And he rose from his chair and paced the room agitatedly, Belmore's eyes following him with an interested gaze.

"I tell you," cried Sarsfield excitedly, catching at the back of a chair to steady his staggering gait. "I can't lose the Derby, Belmore; I won't lose the Derby. Something must be done—must be done to prevent such a tragic disaster. But the question is, what?"

Belmore thought for a moment; then he answered:—

"Perhaps, sir, if you were to make some reparation——"

"Reparation? How can I make reparation to a woman who's been dead these twenty-five years?" broke in Sarsfield.

"No, sir. But you spoke of a child——"

"D—n the child," muttered Sarsfield. "The little brat was the cause of all the mischief."

"Is she alive or dead?" inquired the secretary.

"I know no more than the man in the moon," answered Sarsfield. "Nobody ever brought me any information as to what became of her, and you may be sure I wasn't going to make inquiries on my own account."

"Possibly, however, you might now feel disposed to reconsider your position in the matter," said Belmore, thoughtfully.

"What the —— do you mean?" demanded Sarsfield.

"I mean," explained Belmore, "that it might now suit your purpose to institute inquiries for discovering your daughter's whereabouts—assuming she still lives—with a view to making her some substantial reparation. For my part, indeed, I attach no particular importance to this theory of Nemesis, and I am strongly of opinion that if your colt's good enough to win—which by all accounts he is—he will win on May 27 just as certainly as on any other day in the calendar. But then, I am not you, of course; and if I were in your place and had your feelings on the subject, I should undoubtedly do all in my power to appease the Powers of Vengeance by a propitiatory sacrifice. And if any sacrifice is likely to prove effectual, it will surely be an act of reparation to this unhappy girl."

"Ah! I believe you're on the right track, Belmore—if the girl still lives," hiccoughed Sarsfield, with a new gleam of hope in his eyes. "But if she's dead, what then—hey?"

"Of, if she's dead, of course you can do nothing, sir. Though, even then, the fact of your having interested yourself in the girl and made an effort to discover her might still be scored up to your credit. It would show that you wanted to do the right thing, anyhow, and might influence Nemesis into staying her hand."

"By G—d, there's some hope in that," exclaimed the excited Sarsfield. "But how am I to set about making inquiries for a girl who was born out in Italy twenty-five years ago, and whom I haven't heard of from that day to this? Where's a man to begin—hey?"

Belmore reflected for a moment, then he said:

"I'm afraid your chance of finding the girl—even if she's alive—is but a poor one, in any event. But the likeliest method of getting to work, as far as I can see, is to advertise in all the leading organs of the press. Such an advertisement, appearing in the chief London and provincial newspapers, would probably catch the eye of some one who could supply you with useful information—especially if you offered a reward."

"Well, I suppose it would," answered Sarsfield, putting his large hand to his forehead, as though to steady his half-intoxicated brain. "But, d—n it, Belmore, I don't want to have my name publicly associated with the affair. That would never do."

"And no need for it, either," rejoined the secretary. "You have merely to have answers addressed to a letter or a number at the various newspaper offices, which would keep your name entirely out of it, you see."

"Ah, to be sure," replied Sarsfield. "But, I say, Belmore. It only wants a fortnight to the Derby. There's not much time for inquiry, is there? The advertisement had better be drafted and sent round to the papers first thing to-morow morning."

"I can draft it for you to-night, sir, if you like," replied the secretary, "and take it round myself to the offices of the London papers, so as to get it in in their to-morrow morning's agony columns."

"All right," cried the agitated Sarsfield, who was evidently eager to lose no time. "Draft it now, then, Belmore; or rather, you shall write and I will dictate."
